Bermuda Flight By PAA Clipper Prelude to Race

Literary Digest

Making the 1,600-mile round-trip flight to Bermuda, recently on Pan American Airways' Bermuda Clipper. The Literary Digest's Wings Editor saw dead ahead a tiny dotting of islands 773 miles from New York. Capt. R. O. D. Sullivan, Clipper skipper, had hit it "on the nose."

En route, The Digest Editor enjoyed the strange spetcacle of twenty-five air-minded news-writers looking like wild-eyed boys invited to fly with "The Lone Eagle." The most traveled reporter boasted he never had viewed scenery comparable to Bermuda from the air; the stoutest epicure never had lunched in such luxury.

Features

High points of the start of a trip which the voyagers proclaimed a foretaste of "Things to Come:"

Going up the gang-plank of the big Bermuda Clipper and catching a first glimpse of the interior, smart as that of the latest stream-lined train.

Taking a seat to stare through a porthole at the rain-swept Port Washington, Long Island, harbor.

The roar of the motors cut off as the sound-proofed hull was sealed for the take-off.

The water rushing past as the ship gained momentum down the forbidding bay; then the water dropping gently away.

Aloft, the passengers, staring down at Long Island, watched neat green patches of North Shore estates slip under them, looked ahead into the gray out over the Atlantic.

How

Immediately, groups formed around the experts explaining how it was possible to hit tiny islands hundreds of miles away. This trip was possible, as is the regular semiweekly service scheduled between New York and Bermuda, Sherman Altick, New York Sun Aviation Editor, explained, because of Pan American's highly developed radio system.

Two complete sending and receiving sets on different wave-lengths have a 3,600-mile range. Either of them may be attached to Pan American's direction-finder unit which can be set on any commercial radio station.

Facts

Roving about freely, then inspecting the three eight-passenger cabins strung along the fifty-foot companionway of the ship, the curious learned these facts about the Clipper: Sikorsky-built at Bridgeport, Connecticut, her wings span 182 feet; she is sixty-eight feet long; her 40,500 pounds would balance four top-sized elephants; she is as steady under foot as a Staten Island ferry-boat. The four Pratt & Whitney motors, droning lazily on the wings outside, develop the 3,000 horse-power of an average locomotive.

Less than an hour after the take-off, but already more than 100 miles at sea, the Bermuda Clipper swooped through the "soupy" atmosphere into sunshine and fleecy white clouds. Below, the sparkling water looked as smooth as a mill-pond, actually was running forty-foot waves.

Eight thousand feet aloft seemed the most comfortable position as the steward thought about serving the six-course lunch.

Cruising along at 160 miles an hour, writers settled back for bridge and poker, read a greeting from the British Imperial Airways' Cavalier, passing them with British newspaper men heading for New York on the same route.

Compensation for failure to see the Cavalier a mile below in a bank of clouds was the skipper's order to fly the Clipper around the 850 green isles of Bermuda before landing in Hamilton harbor. Those who never had seen Bermuda's turquoise-blue waters, the coral beaches, the white roofs designed to catch rain-water (the islands have no springs or fresh-water streams) maintained that the ten-minute swing was worth the $100 cost of the flight for future paying passengers.

On the following day's return flight, newsmen recalled that only seven years ago a flier took off for Bermuda from New York, landed in Charleston, South Carolina. That America's Bermuda Clipper and Britain's Cavalier, in test-flights, were hitting their destinations exactly, indicated flying progress, pointed up rumors of transatlantic service expanding from the semi-weekly schedule between New York and Bermuda.

Forecasts

By the end of the summer, it was predicted, the leg between Bermuda and the Azores should be established. Regular service to Europe should come the following year.

Thus, with Imperial Airways collaborating with PAA on the New York-Bermuda service, precedents are being set for international cooperation in bridging that last gap of round-the-world-by-air service—the tough Atlantic. Active, too, are the British with their Empire flying-boats, twenty miles an hour faster than the roomier Clippers.

Race

In friendly rivalry, Pan American, trying to steal a march, has ordered six bigger flying-boats from Boeing. Nearly 100,000 pounds in weight, they probably will cruise at 200 miles an hour, check-mate Imperial Airways' plans for ships to weigh 120,000 pounds and cruise at the same speed.

French effort to get into the picture will be a merged attempt of Air France and the French steamship company, Compagnie Generale Transatlantique. Consolidation of interests between an aircraft company and a steamship line is a logical step, in the opinion of Maj. Alfred J. Williams, U.S.M.C. (Reserve). Already, the Short Brothers Company, building the Imperial Airways boats, is an affiliate of a great British shipbuilding firm.

Much in evidence with their new, four-motored Diesel monoplanes, the Germans are shooting mail-planes across the South Atlantic. Lacking space for passengers, the Germans are sticking to their scheme of stationing at designated positions depot-ships equipped with fuel-supplies and catapults.

American, German, French and British! The four-cornered race for transatlantic supremacy in the air is on!

Gay Summer Fashions

Casual sport clothes and simple but exquisite evening gowns were selected as the backbone of a summer wardrobe by Joan Perry who will be seen in the Columbia production, "The Devil Is Driving," opposite Richard Dix.

Miss Perry rides horseback every morning, and her riding clothes are planned with as much care as her frocks. For summer she has selected white linen breeches topped with handkerchief linen shirts in gay colors always closed at the neck with handsome scarfs.

As suits are favorites with Miss Perry, we find them in all shades of linen as well as in white side by side with her tub frocks.

For the glamorous hours of evening Miss Perry entirely changes the personality of her clothes and steps from casualness to classic sophistication. White is her favorite color for evening and she has selected three of her summer gowns in this hue. There is one of chiffon, one of crepe and one of mousseline. But as black is always the leader in chic grooming Miss Perry is never without such a gown even in summer. Her newest one has a halter neck, is backless, and has a silhouette skirt. A short matching bolero jacket frosted with all-over matt embroidery of crystal beads assures this gown perfect entrance at formal or informal occasions.

FUNERAL SERVICE HELD

The funeral services for Velna Aileen Ray, four year old daughter of the Rev. and Mrs. Hermon S. Ray, of 58 Kagomachi, are being held at 4 p.m. today at the Tokyo Union Church, Onden. She passed away Monday at St. Luke's Medical Center of scarlet fever. Her mother is still in the hospital with scarlet fever but is doing well. The service is being taken by Mr. D. Talkahara assisted by Dr. F. W. Heckelman, of Aoyama Gakuin, and the Rev. Kioki Yuya, pastor of the Koishikawa Baptist Church.

LEAVE JAPAN

Dr. and Mrs. Felix Weingartner left Tokyo Thursday for North China and Manchoukuo on their way home to Europe.

JAPANESE TEA-HOUSE IN AMERICA

Lieutenant-Colonel William C. Crane, military attache to the American Embassy, and Mrs. Crane, who are going to leave Tokyo for home shortly, will take with them a Japanese tea house to re-erect at their home in a certain Eastern sea-resort.

Mrs. Crane is an expert in tea ceremony, and she has asked Mr. Sokei Tsuge, tea master, to design a tea house for her. The tea house is now under construction, and upon completion it will be taken apart and shipped to the United States. Mrs. Crane has named her tea house "Kikyu-an" (return home and rest). While it is the intention of Mrs. Crane to use the tea house for drinking and serving tea, Lieut-Colonel Crane wishes to use it as his study. Thus to the tea house will be attached a Japanese bath room, and the "Kikyu-an" will be a novel tea house having an attached bath room.

Unzen Bungalows Now Ready For Use

With view to filling the need of the large number of visitors to the Unzen National Park who wish to enjoy their vacation in quiet comfort of a kind different from what the hotels and Japanese inns offer, a group of cottages, each standing on a desirable site and adequately separated from the other, have been erected on the camping ground at the foot of the scenic hill of Kinugasa. These cottages stand scattered among the charming cryptomeria forests and their green slate roofs and intense brown walls with white accents blending harmoniously with the surroundings both in color scheme and structural composition. Each of these buildings contains a sitting room, bedrooms, room in Japanese style, a kitchen and other facilities. A veranda is an especially attractive feature of these cottages.

To accommodate the campers who may feel like dining out occasionally and for the convenience of the social life among the stayers, there is a sort of central establishment containing a spacious dining room, tea-room and store. Meals, European and Japanese at the choice of the guest, are served for moderate charge and light refreshments can be had at all hours in both the dining room and the tea-room. The store is stocked with groceries and sundry commodities that are likely to be needed in the kitchen of the campers. Souvenirs and novelties are also sold there and if there is anything that the store does not carry, it will be promptly fetched on order at a reasonable price.

The accommodation at these bungalows and the rates are as follows:

"A" Style—11 in number, each containing a sitting room and 2 bed rooms with 4 single beds, a Japanese room, kitchen and bath-room.

"B" Style—3 in number, each containing a sitting room and 2 bed rooms with 1 double and 2 single beds, a Japanese room, kitchen and bath-room.

"C" Style—3 in number, each containing a sitting room 2 bed rooms with 1 double and 2 single beds, kitchen, bath-room and a separate toilet room.

A veranda is attached to all bungalows. Beddings, kitchen utensils and ordinary articles of household necessity can be be rented from the Office for nominal charges.

The rates are:

for one week ¥40.
for one month ¥120.
for whole season ¥210.

"B" Style,
for one week ¥40.
for one month ¥120.
for whole season ¥210.

"C" Style,
for one week ¥25.
for whole season ¥180.

For the tenants on weekly rates, a reduction will be made for the third and subsequent weeks of stay.

The above rates are in force during the summer season, from June to August, inclusive. For the other seasons, the rates will be reduced by 40 per cent.

The Bungalow Camp is under the management of the Unzen-Obama Motor Bus Company and its office located at the entrance of the camping ground is always ready to render any assistance or service the visitors may desire.

The National Park of Unzen is too well known to need description, for its wholesome summer air, its splendid grounds for winter sports, its 18-hole model golf link, its overflowing abundance of hotsprings and above all for its scenic beauties of mountain and sea. Anyone interested in this all-the-year-round resort is recommended to ask the nearby office of the Japan Tourist Bureau for a copy of the handbook "Suggested Trips from Unzen" which will be cheerfully sent gratis for the asking.

Ocean Competition

Africa and New Zealand before the Ottawa, 1932, agreement expires at the end of this year, making possible a move for bargaining with the dominions which would not be possible if the imperial preferences had long terms to run.

No more vexing problem than that of coordinating British desires for an Anglo-American treaty—principally as an instrument of political prestige—with demands for the continuance of empire preference, has faced the Imperial Conference, at which all government heads agree on the value of such a trade entente but hesitate to make sacrifices for it, which would draw criticism alike from the dominion and agricultural groups and the British industrial bloc.

The atmosphere surrounding the trade treaty possibility was emphasized by a statement at Brighton before the Empire Advertising Convention by Walter Runciman, late president of the Board of Trade, expressing his belief that an Anglo-American treaty would "be consummated in the near future."

Mr. Runciman's statement came as a surprise as he no longer is a member of the government, having resigned to accept a viscountcy and a seat in the House of Lords, and accordingly is not an official spokesman despite his visit to President Roosevelt to discuss trade last Winter.

"There is a great desire in many foreign countries to enter into trade agreements with us," Mr. Runciman said. "One of the latest and one of the most important is the projected trade agreement between ourselves and the United States.

"I only wish I had been able to see that consummated before I left the Board of Trade, but I can assure you that the foundations upon which that is being built are being firmly laid, and I believe those projects will be consummated in the near future."

Police At Loss In Plot Murder Of 2 In France

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

PARIS, June 12—The French authorities admitted today that nothing had been found to identify the murderers of Carlo and Nello Rosselli, Italian brothers found dead yesterday morning in a woods in Normandy. It was feared that the slayers had had time to get far away, since the crime is known to have been committed Wednesday night. Its motive remained a mystery, through relatives of the slain men continued to insist that hired assassins had been sent from Italy. One of the brothers, Carlo, was an active anti-Fascist and a political exile.

The police announced at Bagnoles-de-L'Orne, the health resort near which the double murder was done, that the method used by the killers had been ascertained by piecing together bits of evidence.

It is believed that the Rosellis were killed by four men who had been seen arriving at Bagnoles in a large black automobile. On Wednesday evening, according to the police, the brothers were returning to their hotel after a motor trip when they were halted, about 7 o'clock, by occupants of another car which had stopped at the side of the road.

The strangers, it is assumed, pretended their car had broken down and asked assistance. When the Rosellis alighted and approached the other car, they were set upon and stabbed with daggers. Carlo was killed at once, but Nello was able to search of a revolver, before he died of his wounds. Carlo was also shot through the head.

The dead men were thrown into undergrowth near by and the Rosellis' car was driven to a point five miles away and run into a ditch. In it was found a crude bomb which had failed to explode.

A girl cyclist who rode near the place of the murder soon after it was committed told today how she had seen two cars pass with two men in each. One is believed, from her description, to have been the Rosellis' car, which was followed by the one the murderers used.

Carlo Roselli's widow arrived at Bagnoles today to offer to the police what assistance she could give.

Sees Communist Motive

Dr. Max Ascoli, former faculty member of various colleges in Italy and now professor of political philosophy at the University in Exile, 66 West Twelfth Street, was shocked yesterday at the news of the assassination in France of his lifelong friends, Carlo and Nello Roselli, who, he said, had been active in anti-Fascist movements.

Disagreeing with news dispatches which attributed the murders to agents of the Italian government, Dr. Ascoli said Carlo Roselli had frequently been active against Communism, and there was no reason to eliminate communists as the motivators of the crime.

The brothers, he said, came from an old, aristocratic and wealthy family in Italy. Carlo, since his early youth, had been active in the fight against Fascism, both openly and under cover, and at the time of his death was an exile because of those activities.

Nello, a distinguished historian, Dr. Ascoli said, was not of the aggressive, crusading type of his brother, but of a more studious, contemplative nature. He was, nevertheless, anti-Fascist in his sympathies.

The spectacular career of Carlo, with his imprisonment and escape before he became an exile, was well known, Dr. Ascoli said, but it was not so well known that Nello also had been subjected to the Italian government's police activities.

The World's Revolving

Leftist Opposition get scant answer.

It is not difficult to imagine that Britain which is the stabilizing force which, while superficially tolerant and generous to enemies of peace, has in recent days or weeks made it fairly clear that there is no such thing as the spectre of European conflict to frighten her. No more temporizing. Threats of disorder at home discounted. The possibility of another Spain in France ignored. Nothing will daunt Britain now. Is that the quiet, indomitable attitude of Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Captain Eden and their Cabinet colleagues? Very likely. And it is the sort of spirit to thrill loyal British subjects the world over with patriotic fervor.

It bodes no good for professional subverters.

Columbia's Manager Returns From East

Columbia Pictures Foreign Manager, J. H. Seidelman, who has been visiting the company's offices in China, Japan, and the Philippines for the past three months, arrived in San Francisco on the S. S. "Malola" recently completing his last ocean trip on the return leg of his current tour.

Mr. Seidelman stayed in Los Angeles for a brief studio visit before returning to New York for discussions with Jack Cohn and other H. O. executives on the company's business in the Far East.

Time For Action

"I am grateful to you for the confidence you have reposed in me," orated the winning candidate.

"All right," said a voice in the rear, "but don't do any more reposing. Get busy."—Portland (Me.) Evening Express.

Duce Asks Smith About Roosevelt

By ALFRED E. SMITH

Herald Tribune

MILAN, June 12.—When I arrived in Rome Premier Mussolini was in another part of the country on official business. I was informed by men close to him that he takes no vacations. On the day that he came back to Rome Marshal von Blomberg flew over to see him, and it was assumed they discussed the trouble on the Spanish coast. For that reason my audience with him was delayed from Wednesday to Saturday.

Meanwhile I motored to Florence and enjoyed the quaint towns along the route. I was particularly interested in the City of Siena, the birthplace of St. Catherine. The population is about 33,000, and it seemed to me that every one of them was walking through the narrow streets, that have no sidewalks, all of them happy, good-natured and neatly dressed. Of course, the streets were laid out centuries before anybody ever saw an automobile and are not much wider than the auto itself. One would have to be impressed by the courtesy extended to tourists, as the wayfarers lined up close to the buildings and let us pass. Florence is a beautiful city and can be seen to advantage from the top of an adjoining hill where is located a square dedicated to the memory of Michael Angelo.

On Saturday I returned by rail to Rome and at 5 o'clock in the afternoon I met the most talked-of man in all of Italy, Premier Mussolini. He made a lasting impression on me. His pictures show him as a stern-looking man; he is quite the opposite and has a very pleasing smile and a jolly manner. In the United States we would refer to him as "a regular guy." He was dressed in a Palm Beach suit, becoming his sunny disposition. We had no use for an interpreter, as he speaks English very well.

Naturally, his first question to me was "What do you think of Italy?" and my answer certainly pleased him. He asked me how I found the Pope, as he heard of my visit to Castel Gandolfo, and when I told him that in my opinion the Pope was in remarkable physical condition, considering his age, he clasped his hands and said, "I am so happy to hear that." He then spoke to me of mutual friends among Italian people in the United States and remarked that it was an added pleasure to see me because he knew that the Assembly District I represented for so many years in the Legislature was made up largely of Italian people.

Asks About Third Term

The Premier asked me twice if there is anything in the Constitution of the United States to prevent a President from having a third term, and I told him there is no mention of any such thing in the Constitution but it appears to be a settled tradition. Of course, he did not disclose what he had in his mind and, looking directly at me with a pronounced smile, he said, "How is the New Deal?" and I promptly replied that, in my opinion, it was "not so hot." My reply was met with a much broader smile.

I then asked him if, in his opinion, there was any danger of war, and quickly and very firmly he said "No," and followed that up by saying, "You may take this message to the American people. I am for peace." And for emphasis he repeated "peace" twice.

A book published by the Fascist Confederation of Industrialists says the following: "In possession of Ethiopia, Italy is now a satisfied country, able and willing to be a strong factor for peace and stability in Europe and the world. This is what Italy desires, this is the part she will play in world politics, if the rest of the world cooperates with her toward that end." And it then quotes from a speech by the Premier which contains the following: "We desire to live the longest time possible at peace with all, and we are determined to offer our daily and positive contribution to the work of collaboration between the nations of the world."

This about ended our interview. I asked him to shake hands with Mr. Eugene Garey, one of the party who accompanied me. He very graciously consented, and after a three-handed expression of good wishes, we left his office which, by the way, is located in a spacious building once the property of the Austrian government and used as headquarters of the embassy. It has enormous rooms with high ceilings and, contrary to what might be expected, there was a lack of pomp and ceremony. The fact is that there was a democratic atmosphere surrounding the entire building

Fascism "Satisfies" Italy

After our interview I left on the night train for Milano. There is no question in my mind about the fact that everybody in Italy is behind the Premier, and it makes no difference in what stratum of society he belongs. The emblem of the Fascist party is worn in the buttonhole of the coats of men of all ranks. I am told that, in order to properly appreciate the change that has come over Italy during his administration, one should have visited Italy about fifteen years ago. It makes little difference what people think in other parts of the world of the Fascist government. There is one thing that you can be dead sure about and that is the Italian people are entirely and thoroughly satisfied with it.

Of course, it is only fair for me to say that, in my opinion, no such form of government could obtain in the United States until you did two things: (1) Tear up the Declaration of Independence, and (2), throw the Constitution into the ash can.

I read in a Paris newspaper an article to the effect that a bill was introduced in the English Parliament to broaden the grounds upon which divorce may be secured. In Italy, there are no legal proceedings for the purpose of securing divorce. Once married in Italy it is for life. Marriage may, however, be annulled, but only in accordance with the rules and practices of the church that represents the faith of the married couple.

In closing, I want to make one observation. Since I reached Italy, up to this writing, I did not see on the streets or in any public place a single intoxicated person. In fact, very little hard liquor is consumed in Italy. The favorite drink is wine, and this goes for American visitors as well as for the people of the country.

Production Held Economic Solution

N. Y. Times

JOHNSONBURG, N. J., June 19.—Because "there just isn't enough income to make redistribution worth while" and serious economic dangers would attend such a move, the only way to attain a higher standard of living is through increased production, Seymour L. Andrew, chief statistician of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, declared tonight.

He spoke at the second evening session of the seventh annual economic conference for engineers, sponsored by Stevens Institute of Technology and the Society for Promotion of Engineering Education. Seventy-seven engineers, engineering students and economics professors from thirty colleges and universities are attending conference at Stevens Engineering Camp here.

Assailing the remedy proposed by many to raise the living standard of the underprivileged by taking something away from those receiving higher incomes, Mr. Andrew asserted that even if could be done the income of the average employe would be increased "only a few hundred dollars a year" if all income not now received by wage-earners were distributed to labor.

Not an Easy Task

"Because of the nature of our economic structure and institutions," he said, "It is easier to talk about redistributing the national income than it is to accomplish it. Attempts to redistribute, even if they could be justified on moral grounds, are attended by serious economic dangers.

"Experience shows that such an attempt by raising the cost of production lowers profits and the incentive to produce, reducing produced income and the standard of living," he said.

"I submit that even what little we know about economic shows that the cost practical, if not the only, way to improve the standard of living of the masses is to concentrate upon getting more income to distribute," Mr. Andrew continued, "and that means producing more goods and services."

Dr. Dexter S. Kimball, dean emeritus of engineering at Cornell University, at the opening of his course on industrial economics this morning declared that the term "industrial democracy" was misleading and had given a false impression of modern industry and the qualities requisite to initiating and controlling a modern industrial plant. He added that the degree to which workers could intelligently participate in management was limited.

"Industrial ability, like the ability to navigate a ship," he said, "is a developed quality and cannot be obtained by election."

Dr. R. S. Uhrbrock, director of industrial relations for the Proctor and Gamble Company, who is conducting eight morning sessions in industrial psychology, said that handbooks for average factory workers should be written in a simple vocabulary represented by the 3,000 most commonly used words.

Professor Karl Scholz of the University of Pennsylvania criticized the inclusion of theoretical economics in curricula of engineering schools. Professor E. L. Grant of Stanford University presided at the morning session. The general subject of the nine-day conference is "Labor, Wages and Prices and Their Interrelations."

$355-Earache

Recently Miss Vivian of Chicago, age 17, suffered a strange earache which became more acute day by day until she was forced to remain out of school. It continued to get worse until an ear specialist was consulted. Probing the ear with a fine forceps the Doctor—much to the surprise of Vivian and her father—pulled out an unset diamond, which Mr. Daly quickly recognized as the same diamond that cost him $355 when he purchased it for Vivian's mother many years ago, and which had been lost for 11 years. Mrs. Daly lost the stone out of its setting in 1925 while working around her house. She looked for it high and low but could never figure out what happened to it. Vivian, then a child of six playing on the floor, had picked up the stone, stuffed it into her ear, and promptly forgot about it.

to its enactment in this country.

"Therefore, Be It Resolved, That the house of delegates of the A. M. A. endorse the principles, proposals and recommendations just cited; and

"Be It Further Resolved, That the house of delegates authorize the formation of a committee which shall, in conformity to the above, formulate a national health policy for submission to the government, and further be empowered to confer with government agencies and also with any other medical groups so that differences in conception definition of terms and applicability of principles and procedure may be ironed out in conference regarding those matters in the above principles and proposals which are of national scope and to the end that they may be enacted."

The board of trustees of the American Medical Association voted to recommend the establishment of a Federal department of health, independent of any other governmental agency, under which all Federal health activities would be consolidated.

A report by the bureau of medical economics to the house of delegates included a number of criticisms of the hospitalization insurance movement.

These plans at their best, the report declares, will serve but a small percentage of the eligible population. They make no provision for the care of the indigent, those above certain age limits, or those otherwise excluded, and only slight provision for those chronically sick or unemployed.

Most Sideshow Freaks Are Sick

Many Have Tried In Vain To Become Normal Again

It's circus time, side-show time. The barker is calling his wares. The ticket seller is taking in quarters. The crowds are flocking to see the horrors. And this is pretty funny when you look at it one way, for the chances are that most of the freaks Mr. Man in the Street is paying his hard-earned quarters to see have already been viewed by a good many doctors—for nothing. Many of them have probably even gone so far as to pay to be looked at by doctors. For practically all side-show freaks who are not fakes, and most of them are not, can be found fitted snugly between the pages of some medical textbook. Curiosities they may be but what they more certainly are is sick.

I made this discovery a short time ago when I happened to attend my first side show, surrounded, one on each side and one behind, by the medical profession. For while the barker shouted and while, fascinated, I watched a repulsive-looking lad smilingly fasten a safety pin into his stomach I was hearing in one ear, in tones of grave interest "Amazing. I've never seen a case of syringomyelia before," and in the other, "Well, that sensory loss goes along with one kind of leprosy too, you know," while from behind came the words, "Why make it so difficult? Probably all the fellow has is an advanced case of tabes."

We weren't in a side show at all, it seemed, but a medical clinic, and the consultants were exercising their time-honored right of disagreeing about diagnosis. From then on, as far as I was concerned, my doctor friends completely stole the show. Their patter was probably less dramatic than the barker's, but it was a lot more informative.

The Leopard Man, for instance—A human being with the skin of a beast of the jungle. Look at him, ladies and gentlemen, the only one of his kind—may look pretty fantastic to you. But if you ran across him in a dermatological clinic as you easily might, with no spotlights and no fancy pants, he'd fade right away into a light Negro with a skin disease known as vitiligo. Not that vitiligo is exclusive with Negroes, but it shows up better on them, and vitiligo, skin specialists tell me, is rare, but not so rare but that pictures of lots of Leopard Men can be found in any dermatological textbook. What it is is a fairly mysterious disease that attacks the pigment of the skin, not the skin itself, just the pigment, making it disappear in patches.

Skin With a Snap

A more genuine oddity but still a patient for our clinic is the India Rubber Man, whose skin can be pulled out six inches and returns with the snap of a garter when released. Science in this case, however, can't do much better than the barker. For the best dermatologists can do is to call such talent cutis hyperelastica, which translates a bit tamely into abnormally elastic skin. They know that cutis hyperelastica comes from some defect in the fibers of the skin that govern its suppleness, fibers that are known medically as the elastic fibers, but that's about all they do know. They seem to think it is something a person is born with and that it is probably hereditary. They have no way of curing it, but that isn't so serious, for cutis hyperelastica is no more a handicap than an ability to wiggle your ears—and wouldn't need to interfere with presidential ambitions even, except for the distracting counter-lure of life in the big tent.

The girl who is sometimes billed as the Elastic-Skinned Woman is a different kettle of fish. The one I saw had skin hanging around her thighs in such folds that she could all but pull it up and hide her face in it. This, doctors tell me, is not cutis hyperelastica at all, but merely type called fibromyxoma. The chances are, what's more, that this tumor could fairly easily be removed and the girl herself removed to private life—but she would in all probability find it extremely dull.

The Men from Mars, or Men from the Moon, become through medical eyes nothing in the world but albino Negroes. Their remarkable appearance, as you probably know, comes from a total absence of any pigment in their make-up. Not just a loss in patches like the man with vitiligo—but none. They are born without it, so their hair and eyes and skin are completely colorless except where the blood shows through, which of course is what makes their eyes look pink. Doctors know for a fact that this particular lack is hereditary. It is somewhat commoner in Negroes than in white people and apt to be the result of inbreeding. What is more, albinos are likely to be somewhat below par both mentally and physically, and so it is really a good thing that they can achieve distinction by claiming such a distant birthplace as the moon, since there isn't much chance of their achieving it any other way.

The Blue Man, on the other hand is a lot less fortunate, for his intriguing color is the direct result of somebody's carelessness or ignorance. And he may have the mind of a genius or the soul of a poet, but once he turns blue, blue he is going to stay. For what he has is known to doctors as argyria, and comes from overdoses of silver nitrate or some other silver-containing preparation. It has been known to come from the constant overuse of argyrol for a long period of time, but don't let that keep you from using argyrol when your doctor prescribes it. Argyria is very rare.

The way it happens is depressingly simple. If you've ever studied chemistry you may have, one time or another, spilled silver nitrate on your skin and had it turn black and stay black till it wore off. Well, some years ago there was a vogue among doctors for prescribing silver nitrate for ulcers of the stomach and it undoubtedly did help heal the ulcers, but sometimes too it deposited this dark silver salt through all the cells of the patient's skin, dyeing him a delicate gray-blue as indelibly as if he had been tattooed. The chances are that most of the circus Blue Men, and a good many other people too who are going about their less spectacular businesses in a blue haze, are a result of this unfortunate ulcer cure. But luckily, though science makes mistakes it also makes progress, and the chance of there being many Blue Men and Women when the present supply gives out is pretty slim.

The bread and butter of any side show, as you probably know, depends on the fact that glands occasionally, but only occasionally, over- or underfunction. Such bread and butter are the Fat Lady, the Bearded Lady, the Midgets, the Giants and even the Ugliest Woman in the World.

The Case of Mr. Bones

The Living Skeleton comes so logically after the Fat Lady, both because of his oppositeness and because of the tales you constantly hear of love affairs between the two, that I can't leave him out. But he strictly doesn't belong here at all, for there's almost no chance of the Living Skeleton being a glandular case. Certain glandular diseases, doctors tell me, do cause excessive thinness, but when they do they also make people so weak that they couldn't conveniently go on display. It is unexcitingly possible that the Living Skeleton is merely a naturally very tall, very thin person who has starved himself into still geater thinness for the sake of a fat contract. But what is more likely is that the Living Skeleton has an advanced but arrested case of tuberculosis. This would explain his emaciation, and it would explain, too, all the tales you may have heard of the love life of Living Skeletons; their violent passions for the Fat Lady or the Tattooed Lady or the Snake Charmer, so violent that they have been known to end in murder or suicide. And the reason it would explain it is that tuberculosis, doctors have noticed, seems to have some side effect on the emotions, making people with the disease even more prone to fall desperately in love than you or I.

Tokyo's "Floating Population"

Seventeen thousand people live in the boats on Tokyo Bay.

Night-soil boats, dust-boats, dredgers are seen in the rivers and moats which flow through the city of Tokyo.

We often see motorboats pulling two or three cargo-boats at the mouth of the Sumida river, or near the river side fish market, in Tokyo. Sometimes, we see little children playing, or the boatmen's wives washing rice on these boats. We even see dirty looking clothes being spread on the boats to be dried. These sights tell us of the fact that water-farers in Tokyo Bay are leading peaceful family lives in these boats.

"Seji" is the term given to that part of the boats where the water-farers dwell. These boats are called "seji-boats." There are about 7,000 boats which are under the control of the Tokyo water-police. There are 12,000 men and 5,000 women who form a special community.

About 131,250 kg. of dust emanate daily from the Japanese capital.

Eighty dust-boats carry this dust to Susaki to be burnt. The ashes are used for reclaiming work. The dust is burnt either by means of furnaces or in the open air. There are about three hundred people who are engaged in open air dust burning. They sort out refuse or rags from among the dust. It is said that they can earn up to about eighty sen per day.

There are 14 large and 180 small dredgers. These are under the control of the Tokyo Public Works Bureau. About 30 cubic meters of mud are dredged from the bottom of over fifty rivers. This mud is also used for reclaiming work.

There are also many boats for carrying gravel. All the boats mentioned just above belong to the Tokyo municipality. The rest of them belong to the shipping agents. There are about 370 shipping agents in the vicinity of Shibaura. These boats are used for the transportation of rice, sugar, salt, soya beans and sake for daily consumption, and also for the transportation of fuel and building materials such as coal, foreign paper, iron etc. Every year nearly 25,000,000 tons of goods are carried to and from the city of Tokyo. Of this about 9,000,000 tons are carried to Tokyo by the water-farers of Tokyo and Yokohama. In 1935, about 5,272,040 tons of goods were carried to Tokyo by the water-farers, and 120,200 tons of goods were carried out from the city of Tokyo by those people. Thus the water-farers of Tokyo Bay are giving valuable service to the citizens of Tokyo.

Where the river boats assemble in Sumida River to unload cargo.

Christmas-time along the rivver-front.

Living Condition

"Shikomi" is a system adopted by the water-farers. It is a system of borrowing freight in advance. There are two kinds of "shikomi"; these are "tsumi-shikomi" and "teiki-shikomi." In the former case a part, or the whole of the freight is lent in advance, while in the latter case freight is fixed in the form of a salary. It is usually about ¥30 per month. They need not pay house rent. That is why with this income they can lead an easy going life.

Sometimes agents become bankrupt by lending out too much money in advance. Labor disputes break out even among the water-farers. If the negotiations rupture, all the boats are collected together, and the headquarters for the discontented set up. Since all the families live together in the boats, there are no betrayers.

Generally, a water-farer gets between ¥50 and ¥60 per month. Sometimes eleven in a family sleep on three tatami or mats.

Water-farers usually have many children; most of them have five or six children; there are many who have eight or nine children. The majority of the "seji" are not wide enough to accommodate more than three tatami. In some cases eleven families are known to sleep in such a narrow place. So most of the "seji" are dirty; they are badly ventilated. Charcoal is quite sufficient to keep the "seji" warm in winter. Crimes are practically unknown in the boats. Every year about 160 accidents take place in the form of collisions or sinking.

Since they are leading so-called nomadic life, government authorities are handicapped greatly at the time of census. It is safer to say that their census registration is in the Tokyo Bay.

Water-farers do not envy life on land.

About 80 per cent of the water-farers are the successors of their parents. Formerly, when the water of the Sumida river was clear, there were many restaurants on the banks of the river. These restaurants had pleasure-boats. The boatmen of those days had, in course of time, made the boats their permanent residence. Since the Russo-Japanese War the number of water-farers had greatly increased with the opening of Shibaura harbor. It seems that they have no desire for land life.

Water-farers' children

There are about 5,000 children of age whose parents are water-farers. Some 80 per cent of these children attend school under the protection of their relatives or friends on shore. The Tokyo suijo-jinjo-shogakko is in Tsukishima. This is supervised by the Tokyo-suijo-kyokai. Of course there is a boarding house in the school. About 10 per cent of the children of water-farers are attending this school; the remaining 10 per cent are not attending any school.

Water-farers' children on shore behave the habit engendered aboard of throwing away things. There are many children who are suffering from hereditary venereal disease.

Such children are capricious and irritable. Without medical treatment they die young. Sick girls die mostly at the age of twelve or thirteen, while boys die mostly when they reach the age of twenty.

Some of these water-farers do not have opportunity to see their school children even once a month. They cannot tell definitely when and where their boats are to be situated; they have no permanent address. Their children do not know the whereabouts in the river of their parents. Sometimes the parents tell their children to come and see them at a certain place on a certain day. But in some cases children return home very disappointed by not being able to see their parents after having waited for half a day.

The water-farers' children are not well developed. It is probably because they cannot get sound sleep.

Products Thrive In Sawdust 'Soil' Of 'Bathtub Farm'

BERKELEY, California.—Greater crops than ever before come from Dr. W. F. Gericke's "bathtub farm," as a novel electric heating device for regulating the temperature of his sawdust-excelsior "soil" allows extended seasons.

So successful have been the experiments of growing tomatoes, strawberries, sweep peas and other crops in chemically treated water confined to concrete or metal-lined nursery benches that commercial growers in Capitola, Los Angeles, Watsonville, and Richmond are using this method.

Novel electric heating cables are placed at the bottom of water-filled vats or benches beneath mesh chicken wire. Then excelsior, sawdust or other suitable litter is spread on the wire to serve as a seed bed and for insulation against excessive heat loss. The "farmer" plants his seeds on the bedding, kept moist by the water beneath. As the plants grow, their roots extend downward into the water, in which necessary chemicals are placed as fertilizing units, supplying just the elements, each in proper form and concentration.

Dr. Gericke is now continuing his experimental work with cucumbers, papaya and floral crops. Extraordinary success was achieved with tomatoes. Practically every flower on every plant formed sizable fruit, and numerous trusses were necessary. A single plant brought by this method of farming form 15 to 25 tomatoes.

Potatoes, too, gave very high yield. An ordinary dirt farmer considers himself fortunate if he can raise from 2000 to 4000 bushels of potatoes to the acre. Dr. Gericke achieves 2,500 bushels in an equal area.

British Empire's Cotton Output Is Highest on Record

MANCHESTER, Eng. — Empire cotton production exceeded all previous records in the past year, according to the thirty-second annual report of the British Cotton Growing Association. Although in the majority of the territories involved climatic conditions were far from good and poor crops were harvested, the approximate estimate of cotton grown and produced in Empire fields reached slightly more than 750,000 bales.

Uganda, producing a record crop for that country more than balanced shortages elsewhere, and again heads the list of producers; the Sudan taking second place with a smaller production than in 1935—mainly due to rains and colder weather during the ripening season.

Empire's Output Higher

The estimate of cotton grown in the Empire countries last year shows a production of 752,800 bales (of 400 pounds), as compared with 700,000 in 1935, a little more than 500,000 bales in the three preceding years, and 390,200 bales in 1931. The approximate value of the 752,800 bales was £16,380,013. In addition, there was a production of improved long-staple cotton in the Punjab and Sind during the 1935-36 season of 873,000 bales.

Uganda's exports reached 321,400 bales and the Sudan's 251,800 bales Great Britain's imports of raw cotton (except linters) included 706,768 bales from Egypt, 198,336 from the Sudan, 36,771 bales from Kenya and Uganda, and 27,815 bales from Nigeria.

In India the British Cotton Growing Association (Punjab) Ltd. now controls about 134,000 acres, including 27,000 in Baluchistan.

One of the outstanding features of the agricultural development of the province of Sind has been the rapid extension of cotton cultivation since the opening of the Lloyd Barrage and canal systems. In the 1935-36 season the area under cotton was 804,170 acres and the production 323,020 bales.

Causes of Increase

This development is largely due to the availability of an adequate perennial and assured water supply, the introduction of hardier and more suitable types of cotton, and the enhanced interest taken by zemindars in cotton growing because of its profits as compared with those of other crops. Superior (American) varieties of cotton comprise the bulk of the crop, and the area devoted to cotton there is expected to reach 1,000,000 acres in the next few years, while a total production of 500,000 bales is anticipated.

Last year the total production of Sea Island cotton amounted to 3694 bales, compared with 3662 bales in the previous 12 months. The acreage had been increased by 50 per cent, but bad weather conditions in Montserrat resulted in a potential loss of about 100 bales. This was a severe blow to the peasant growers, of whom there are at least 10,000 in the West Indies.

In the southern provinces of Nigeria, which exported 8576 bales last year, compared with 5715 the previous years, the improved Ishan type has now almost completely replaced the old indigenous type. The Northern Provinces exported 49,793 bales, as against 50,022 in 1935.

New Marketing Rules

New marketing regulations, designed primarily for the improvement of grading and marketing, were in operating for the first time, and already benefits were seen. A far bigger proportion of first-grade was marketed free from the troublesome intermixing of early years; and farmers, displacing the numerous middlemen, presented their own cotton for examination, which in most cases was so well graded that few rejections were necessary.

Kenya's production rose from 8774 bales in 1935 to 15,636 last year, and the 14,538 bales exported were valued at £149,789. Japan and China took 4571 bales, India 3091 and the United Kingdom 3074 bales.

Tanganyika's production increased by 500 bales to 63,428 bales, and only 10 per cent was non-native production. Owing to excessive rainfall, cold weather, disease, and pests, Nyasaland's exports dropped from 20,485 bales to 13,200.

In the Union of South Africa production fell from 2967 bales to 1932. Northern Rhodesia contributed no bales and Southern Rhodesia's production only reached 329 bales.

The amount ginned in the 1935-36 season in the Sudan, 251,725 bales, included 215,10 bales of irrigated Sakellaridis, 14,692 irrigated American, and 21,853 bales of rain-grow American.

Jump in Uganda's Exports

Uganda's exports of 321,348 bales were valued at £3,326,879 or nearly £400,000 more than in any of the preceding five years. The area planted was 1,366,974 acres, an increase of 180,000 acres as compared with 1935. India took 162,350 bales, Japan and China 115,565 bales and the United Kingdom 28,788 bales. Of the 85,762 tons of cotton seed exported the United Kingdom took 78,200 tons.

The report states that the outstanding features of last year were the rise in the price of most commodities, including, but by no means confined to, metals, wool, rubber, etcetera, and prosperity in the basic heavy industries, embracing iron, steel, engineering and electrical, and a consequent reduction in unemployment.

In contrast with the position of nearly every other commodity, cotton has shown little tendency to follow any extreme course, the restraining influence being the ever-present possibility of the release of the controlled cotton held by the Government of the United States of America and the increased supplies of outside growths, Empire and other, which appear adequate to meet demands.

It is perhaps all to the good, it is pointed out, that such a contingency and supply should overhang the market, and whatever may be the view taken of the United States Control Board, it must be acknowledged that its action has had a steadying influence on the course of prices.

Britain Pledges Aid To Push Film Industry

LONDON.—The British Government is determined to establish conditions in which the British film industry cannot only hold its own, but also expand its activities, according to an official statement by Lord Templemore.

It is therefore extending the so-called Quota Act, which is due to expire in 1938. Under this act exhibitors in British cinemas are compelled to build up their programs with at least 20 per cen of English films.

According to Lord Templemore the act has been a success, for exhibitors at present are stated to be showing 25 per cent of British pictures, which is 5 per cent in excess of the legal requirements. In 1926, when the act came into being, English films formed only 5 per cent of British programs.

The need for continued protection of the British film industry against competition is freely admitted in London. Without it the English picture trade would probably collapse. Even as it is, only 13 long, or feature, films are being made in Britain, whereas the studios round London can accommodate 58 productions at a time.

There are 5000 cinemas in Britain, which require 600 films a year. Under the current quota requirements 120 of these must be English. At the present slump rate of production this quota will not be filled.

Big Investment at Stake

The Government's decision has been awaited with deep interest in the film world, and has been received with satisfaction. There is a general feeling that the British film industry must not be allowed to disappear. This feeling is based on three main grounds.

The first is that the industry represents a great outlay of capital. In 1936 alone millions of pounds were invested in English companies. The studios at Denham, Pinewood, and Shepherd's Bush have hundreds of thousands of pounds invested in them.

When Shepherd's Bush was opened three or four years ago it was claimed to be the most up-to-date and largest film studio in the world. It has now had practically to close down. The same fate looms over many another film center round London, and intensive efforts are being made to avert it.

British films are also said to be representative of British culture, carrying English ideals to the farthest ends of the earth. This claim is, however, in some quarters met with skepticism. It is pointed out that "Cavalcade," for which this claim is especially made, was an American production, though it had an English star.

Classics Made in Hollywood

Many of the great English classics notable among which is "David Copperfield," similarly come from Hollywood. But, recently one or two British companies have turned their attention to the potentialities of Imperial history. Gaumont-British made a film about Cecil Rhodes (though the star was brought over from America), and another about the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sentiment also plays a large part in the demand for the continuance of English films. England has been in at the film game right from the beginning, and there would be general regret were she forced out of it now.

The first of England's big companies was established in 1907 by Cecil M. Hepworth. One of Hepworth's chief stars was Stuart Rome, who is still featured in big British pictures today.

In the recent past it has been widely thought that the Government would interfere radically with the conduct of British films. One Government department, the General Post Office, has its own film unit, and some of its productions have won world-wide fame. It specializes in documentaries, under the direction of John Grierson, whose film of the herring industry, "Drifters," made cinema history.

American Income Rises 16 Per Cent To$63,799,000,000

WASHINGTON, June 14 —A 16 per cent rise in the national income produced in the United States last year was reported today by the Department of Commerce.

The net value of all commondities produced and services rendered in 1936 totaled $63,799,000,000 compared with $55,000,000,000 in 1935, the department said.

The 1936 increase brought the national income up 60 per cent above the depression low of 1932. It was still about 20 per cent below the 1929 "prosperity" level.

The estimates were made by Robert R. Nathan, chief of the national income section of the division of economic research. He predicted that the increase would continue in 1937, but that the total would still be considerably under the 1929 record of $78,000,000,000.

National income produced was defined in the report as "the net value of all commodities produced and services rendered in the nation." Income paid out, which was $1,143,000,000 less than that produced, is the aggregate of wages, salaries, interest, dividends, entrepreneurial withdrawals, net rents and royalties paid to individuals and other funds paid for personal services.

From 1930 through 1934—the years of severest depression, income paid out exceeded income produced, resulting in business losses, but this trend has been reversed during the last two years.

Labor's share of the national income paid out in 1936 was the highest on record, amounting to 66.5 per cent, compared with 64 per cent in 1932 and 65.5 per cent in 1929. The percentage paid out in dividends rose to 7.4 per cent, which is only slightly below the portion paid out in dividends in 1929. Dividends last year amounted to $4,573,000,000.

Comparing income with prices, Mr. Nathan said that since Department of Labor statistics showed only a 1 per cent increase in wholesale prices and cost of living indexes rose only 1 per cent in 1936, the increase in income produced largely represented an increase in the physical volume of goods and services produced. From 1933 to 1936, the report said, national income rose 38 per cent, while the cost of living advanced only 8 per cent.

This rebound of income outdistancing prices as it has, has meant a "much enlarged real purchasing power for individuals," Mr. Nathan said. Per capita income of individuals was listed at $1244 for 1936, or about 88 per cent of the 1929 figure.

War Threatens Spain's

Tome, originally a mosque, but rebuilt in the Gothic style at the expense of the Count of Orgaz. From the time of its completion, the picture had remained in this church. In the lower half, the canvas portrays the legendary burial of the Count in this Church by Saints Augustine and Stephen. In the upper section is portrayed the reception of the Count in heaven.

Several French art enthusiasts have expressed the hope that the picture will be recovered before the Pairs exhibition and will occupy a prominent place.

Until a new inventory and authentication is made by world experts in France, no one will be able to assert positively what has been rescued from the civil war in Spain. There are many stories current about enthusiastic loyalist soldiers saving modern pieces because they looked new and throwing away priceless tapestries dating from the twelfth century; books are said to have suffered a similar fate.

Heroes

One of the most notable museums of Madrid, the converted Palace of the Duke of Alba, was almost completely destroyed. While it still was burning, militiamen ran in and, at the peril of their lives, salvaged some of the treasures. It is believed that most of the Titians, Rembrandts and Goyas were saved. One American correspondent saw bundles of Goya tapestries being loaded on trucks bound for Valencia.

There is some doubt about the Francisco Goya frescos in the Hermitage of San Antonio de la Florida, which has been bombed heavily in raids near the North Station. The peasant-born painter (1746-1828) decorated the ceiling of the Hermitage with frescoes representing St. Anthony preaching and performing miracles—full of life and movement. but with a minimum of religious sentiment.

Early in the fighting, El Greco's "San Ildefonso" was taken from the Church of Illesces, south of Madrid, for safety. Fine Velasquez, Titian, Ribera and Tintoretto works also were removed from El Escorial and stored in the vaults of the Bank of Spain. Only inaccessible ceiling paintings were left.

A curious incident occurred after the attack on the church in Sitgas, a seaside resort-town south of Barcelona. A wooden image of the Virgin was flung into the sea. Voices in the crowd cried, "No, no, she is wood; she might float to Italy and they would say it was another miracle." The figure then was taken hastily out of the water and burned.

Madrid's Prado contains some 2,500 paintaings and 500 pieces of sculpture. It reputedly has the finest collections of Velasquez, El Greco, Goya, Murillo and Zurburan, as well as fine works of Titian, Tintoretto, Rubens, Correggio and Van Dyck.

Conquest

The masterpiece of Velasquez, "The Surrender of Breda," is in the Prado. It shows the Spanish conqueror, Spinola, backed by the lances of his soldiers, receiving the keys of Breda from the Hollanders in 1626.

The rooms in the Prado originally were intended for a collection on natural history but, in recent years, were transformed into one of the finest of art galleries.

In the collection, Diego Velasquez (1599-1660) is represented by about sixty genuine works, ranging from his twentieth year to his death. The great colorist is represented in all his different phases as a painter: portrait, historical, landscape and portrayer of biblical, mythological and genre subjects. There are about the same number of Murillos and a large number of Riberas. The Spanish School of the fifteenth-eighteenth centuries is represented by almost all its masters.

The collection likewise is rich in works from Italy and the Netherlands. There is an altar-piece by Fra Angelico and "The Death of the Virgin" by Mantegna, both important fifteenth-century Italian works. Ten pictures are attributed to Raphael. There also are a fine Andrea del Sarto, two paintings by Sebastiano del Piombo and two Correggios. The Venetian School is represented by a Giorgione and forty Titians. The later Venetians, from Paolo Veronese to Tiepolo, also are represented.

Horror at the idea of the Spanish art treasures being demolished was voiced by Thomas Craven, American art critic, author of "Modern Art" and "Men of Art."

"But I have no doubt, if this ferocious business is not somehow checked, that Spain will go the limit and demolish her masterpieces, just as other nations have done when their blood was up. You will remember that the Turks dynamited the Parthenon; that Napoleon stabled his horses in the building containing Leonardo da Vinci's 'The Last Supper; and that the old Italians were ready to raze the city of Florence to the ground in order to satisfy an insane political passion."

Mrs. Nakano Drops Match After Good Try At New York

By ALLISON DANZIG

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, June 18.—Mrs. Tokuko Nakano, former champion of Japan, was eliminated from the women's New York State championship at the Jackson Heights Tennis Club yesterday as Miss Norma Taubele, the defending titleholder, and Miss Eunice Dean of San Antonio gained the semi-final round.

Mrs. Nakano's defeat came about after she had wrested the opening set from Miss Dean and rallied at 1-3 in the final chapter to come within a point of squaring the stubbornly fought match at 4-all. The score was 5-7, 6-2, 6-3.

Miss Taubele, tentative and erratic at the start of her match with Mrs. Mary Keller, lost the first three games and then put a quietus on her opponent's deep drives. Speeding up her footwork and pasting the ball to the lines with her beautiful ground strokes, the champion ran out the set without the loss of another game and dropped only one in the second chapter to win at 6-3, 6-1.

Miss Hirsh Plays Today

The other two quarter-final matches will be played this afternoon, it was announced by Chairman Gerald Lumsden. Miss Millicent Hirsh, runner-up for the national indoor crown, will meet Miss Helene Lymen at 2, and at 3 Miss Grace Surber will play Miss Helen Germaine. One doubles semi-final will also be put on, bringing together Miss Hirsh and Miss Minnie Fullen of Waco, Texas, and Miss Josephine Dumas and Mrs. Sena Waxel.

The meeting between Miss Dean and Mrs. Nakano was a battle of backhands, in which each player studiously contrived to keep the ball away from her opponent's forehand. The deciding factor, as it usually is in Miss Dean's victories, was the Texas girl's drop shot, one of the most effective in women's tennis.

In the opening set Miss Dean lacked the touch and almost every drop shot she attempted when she was hitting against the wind found the net as she fell behind at 1—4. Miss Dean then got the range and pulled up to 4—all, only to falter and yield the set.

Effort Takes Its Toll

Mrs. Nakano's quickness and untiring court covering had pulled her through, but the effects of her continual running up to the net and back to the baseline told on her in the second.

In the final set Miss Dean's slices, chops and drop shots had Mrs. Nakano running all over the court and the American went to 3—1. Here the Japanese player got her second wind and rallied beautifully to save point after point after she had been forced out of position.

Miss Dean was wasting her openings with costly mistakes and it looked serious for her. But, with Mrs. Nakano needing only a point for 4—all, Miss Dean attacked with stinging strokes, her opponent's control wavered and the match came to an abrupt end.

THE SUMMARIES

Singles.

Quarter-final Round—Miss Norma Taubele defeated Mrs. Mary Keller, 6-3, 6-1; Miss Eunice Dean defeated Mrs. Tokuko Nakano, 5-7, 6-2, 6-3.

Doubles

Second Round—Miss Josephine Dumas and Mrs. Sena Waxel defeated Miss Charlotte McNeill and Mrs. Guy Bostwick, 8-6, 3-6, 6-3; Miss Grace Surber and Miss Taubele defeated Miss Beatrice Kellogg and Miss Mary Parker, 6-3, 6-3.

Worry

A man on trial for his life was being examined by a group of alienists. Suddenly one doctor shouted at him:

"Quick! How many feet has a centiped?"

The man came back in a dry voice, "Gosh! Is that all you got to worry about?"—Punch Bowl.

"The government of the United States," the note said, "is now confronted with the necessity of deciding, after repeated and frank efforts to arrive at a mutual understanding of purpose as regards an international understanding, whether the only course practicable for the United States to pursue is an entire withdrawal from all further efforts to cooperate in Siberia, to be followed, if need be, by a public statement of the reasons for such action, since it might be misunderstood if no explanation is made."

Mellon Denies

enter, competition therein does exist and benefits therefrom accrue to the public."

Dividends Are Analyzed

As to its earnings, the company, according to the answer, paid total cash dividends to stockholders of $86,237,743 during the forty-six years prior to December 31, 1934, which is an average annual return to stockholders of slightly more than 3 per cent upon the net assets invested in the company's business.

No cash dividends upon the common stock have been paid since 1925, it is pointed out, and dividends on preferred stock are still in arrears in the amount of $9, though the arrearage is to be reduced to $6.75 by July 1.

In his answer to the government's complaint, Mr. Mellon admits that "the Aluminum Company was the sole producer of virgin aluminum in the United States," but denies that the company fixed prices for all "virgin aluminum moving in interstate trade or commerce."

Mr. Mellon also denied that he had ever participated in any agreement or understanding to fix arbitrary or excessive prices, to discriminate or to indulge in any unfair prices.

His answer sets forth that on June 1, 1928, the company, "in exchange for certain of its properties abroad, received stock from Aluminium, Ltd., and that that stock was then distributed to stockholders of the American company as a dividend."

Among the defendants who answered are Richard K. Mellon, as executor of the estate of R. B. Mellon, Arthur V. Davis, president of the Aluminum Company; Ailsa Mellon Bruce, Richard K. Mellon personally; Paul Meillon, Sarah Melon Scaife, individually and as executors of the R. B. Mellon estate and Jennie King Mellon.

Among the corporations which filed answers are the Aloxite Corporation, Aluminum Manufactures, Inc.; Carolina Aluminum Company, Cedar Rapids Transmission Company, Ltd.; St. Louis and Ohio Railroad, St. Lawrence River Power Company, Republic Mining and Manufacturing Company and the Aloxite Corporation.

Dr. Angell Attacks Roosevelt Regime

N. Y. Times

NEW HAVEN, June 20.—Asserting that citizens used to weighing their words feel that this nation faces a crisis comparable in its gravity with the Civil War, President James Rowland Angell said today in his last baccalaureate as executive head of Yale University, that while need existed for trained intelligence, sensitive imagination and sound judgment, far more fundamental were the choices of college graduates of the kind of a world they wish to dwell in and have their children inherit.

The individual human soul and its aspirations must occupy the center of the picture of humanity, he stated, addressing the seniors and a large public attendance in Woolsey Hall. Dr. Angell said in part:

"Legislation designed to relieve tension in industrial relations has either been completely disregarded, or, if belatedly used, has often been made a ground for disorder. Most extraordinary perhaps of all, and distinguishing this upheaval from any we have known before, is the fact that the national government has appeared as a partisan in the conflict.

"The Secretary of Labor is quoted as not knowing whether a sit-down strike is legal or not, although there is hardly any older doctrine in our common law than that affecting the right or possession of property. The Executive is charged with having encouraged much of the existing disorder, first by silence in the face of gross violation of law and destruction of property by labor, and then by criticism of employers for failing to sign contracts with labor groups whose good faith they regard as open to question.

Sees Danger to Congress

"Certain it is that he has promoted legislation which, if finally enacted, appears to imply the further and complete abdication of the Congress; already more than once put into the stultifying position of mere puppets of the Executive. This end is to be achieved through the confiding to innumerable anonymous commissions of powers which we had supposed the Constitution protected for use in perpetuity.

"To assure this rape of the Constitution, it is proposed to bring the judiciary also under the control of the Chief Magistrate, that these revolutionary measures may in due time be pronounced by the courts constitutional.

"Many sober-minded and honorable men feel that if such things can happen we shall have left to us little but the empty shell of democracy, a mere mockery, a mere name.

"With many of my fellow-citizens who wish and strive to be fair minded, I believe that the great mass of employers are willing and eager to deal justly with their employes, that they all learned long ago that vigorous, intelligent and contented labor is the most important single asset that industry can have, that far the larger number are equally willing and ready to bargain with bona fide representatives of their employes, that they are sincere in their belief that it is wrong to compel men to join a union and pay dues if they do not wish so to do.

"I am equally persuaded that the great mass of working men want only fair treatment and honorable conditions of life, with the doors of opportunity opened for their children, with protection against needless unemployment, and complete freedom to join, or not to join, such unions as they choose; and that as good citizens, many of them property holders, they are as unwilling to be exploited by labor bosses and racketeers as by employers.

"Finally, I do not question, indeed I actively sympathize with, the altruistic purposes of the central government in seeking to help the underdog in the economic struggle, in the desire to give the underprivileged everywhere a hand up and a fair break, in the effort to see that the profits of business are more equitably distributed, in the intent to put both agriculture and industry on a stable and satisfactory basis.

"What occasions me deep anxiety is that so many of the methods proposed to achieve all these desirable ends seem to me headed straight away from all our traditions of American democracy and toward the same abyss which has engulfed a large part of Europe.

"Were there at stake only the betrayal of a great political tradition which our fathers gave their lives to establish, the unabashed creation of a new absolutism masquerading as democracy, I should be shocked and dismayed, yet I might hesitate to challenge it in this place. But I deeply believe that it contains latent within it a promise of the ultimate corrosion and subversion of all those higher spiritual forces in the nation which are our just concern this morning.

"I believe it is humanly certain that any government given complete authority over the economic interests of the nation, political conditions being what they are, will presently take over education, and then all the other cultural and spiritual interests, and finally impinge on religion itself.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE.

Rosselli Plotted To Oust Mussolini

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, June 13.—Carlo Rosselli, exiled Italian anti-Fascist, who with his brother, Nello, Italian historian, was murderd Friday at Bagnoles-de-l'Orne, France, was the leader of Giustizia e Liberta, "the most feared underground anti-Fascist movement in Italy," according to Dr. Max Ascoli, exiled Italian professor of the University in Exile of the New School for Social Research, 66 West Twelfth Street.

In an interview yesterday, Dr. Ascoli, a life-long friend of the Rosseli brothers and a professor of law at Italian universities before his exile, presented a brief history of the two brothers which, he said, would "explain the reason why they met their deaths."

"Carlo and Nello Rosseli were the descendants of a prominent Italian family which had long been active in the Risorgimento, the movement for national unification of Italy," Dr. Ascoli asserted. "Their grandfather was an intimate friend of Mazzini, hero of Italian independence, and the two brothers were raised under the family tradition of patriotism and liberalism.

"Carlo, who was born in Rome in 1899, fought as a volunteer with the Italian Army during the World War. With the rise of fascism in Italy, Carlo, who served a year as professor of political economy at the University of Genoa, foreswore the possibilities of an academic career and gave both his entire effort and his fortune to the activities of the underground anti-Fascist movement in Italy.

Arrested for Aiding Turati

"He was arrested in 1926 by the Fascist government after he had helped Filippo Turati, a leader of the Italian Socialist party, to escape to France in a motor boat. Returning to Italy in the motor boat to help other anti-Fascist leaders escape the country, Carlo was seized by the police and sentenced to five years' imprisonment on the Lipari Islands.

"At his trial, Carlo declared that he had 'no apology' to offer for his assistance to Turati. He pointed out that he was proud that he was able to continue the traditions of his family and that he had aided Turati 'as my grandfather helped Mazzini.'

"After spending several months at the Lipari Islands, Carlo, together with two other exiles, made an almost miraculous escape to Tunis in a small motorboat, outrunning several Italian warships which were chasing them. On reaching Tunis one of his very first acts was to send a telegram to Mussolini informing him of his escape and notifying him, 'I am once again active in the anti-Fascist movement.'

When he reached Paris Carlo at first worked with the refugees of the Italian Socialist party, but he soon grew restless of the control exerted by the old-time exiled politicians and founded a new democratic movement, Giustizia e Liberta (Justice and Liberty) which was to be active inside Italy through contact with the younger Italian generations.

"This movement soon became the leading opposition to the Fascist regime. Many of its members were arrested by the Fascist police, but Carlo, working from Paris, was always able to reconstruct the organization and keep it functioning until it reached a point where it became the most feared of all underground movements in Italy.

"In August, 1936, with the outbreak of civil war in Spain, Carlo organized and armed a column of Italian anti-Fascist volunteers who fought with the Spanish Loyalist Government. Carlo was wounded in an engagement at Huesca and returned to Paris to recover from the wound.

Nello Was a Historian

"Nello Rosselli, born in 1901, although sharing the political traditions of his family, was never actively engaged in politics. He was a brilliant writer and was considered an outstanding historian. Because of his brother's activity, however, he was unable to acquire any academic position. He spent his time, mainly at Florence, with the study of history and farming.

"He was arrested several times due to his brother's political activities, and in 1927, after his brother's escape, was exiled to the Island of Ustica. After a few months he was permitted to return to Florence, but lived under constant police supervision.

"Nello was well liked in Italy, even by the fascisti. The leading Fascist historian, Volpe, on several occasions helped him with his work, considering him an outstanding historian. He was also well known abroad where he participated in many international meeting of historians.

"He recently left Florence for a short visit with his brother in Paris. That visit, as you know, resulted in his murder."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Riding Whip Tree

At a church named "Kadesh Chapel," five miles from Bethany College, West Virginia, the first services were held in 1791, and Rev. Haymond was the first minister. He died shortly thereafter, and his sweetheart, with whom he had often ridden horseback, stuck her riding whip in his grave. From this stick has grown the largest elm tree in the vicinity—so large that it now shades the entire church building—a mute memorial to the church founder and the undying devotion of his loved one.

The Greatest Home Run

It happened on Sunday, October 10, 1920. Cleveland faced Brooklyn in the first inning Elmer Smith came up with Burleigh Grimes in the box and the World's Series a tie. In the first inning Elmer Smith came up to bat, the bases full, and he hoisted a terrific clout far over the right field fence, bringing in four runs. It was the first World's Series home run with bases full in history, and the mighty burst of applause for Smith is doubtless still ringing in his ears.

Social and Personal Notes

AT MIYANOSHITA

The Countess de Tascher, with her son, is spending the summer in Miyanoshita at the Fujiya Hotel.

GRANDSONS BORN

Mrs. Henry Monfort Cary has two grandsons born recently. Maurt Tigner was born on April 21, to her daughter Julia, Mrs. Hugh S. Tigner, of Middletown, N. Y. and Edward Vaughan Morgan was born on July 11 to her daughter Alfreda, Mrs. Goeffrey Vaughan-Morgan, of Colwall, near Malvern, Worcestshire, England.

PUBLICITY COUNSEL HERE

Mr. Ray Davidson, publicity counsel for Los Angeles, and Mrs. Davidson are now at the Imperial Hotel. They will spend two weeks here before going to China and later take the Trans-Siberian Railway to Europe.

REMAIN IN TOKYO

Their duties at the Ernest Eigo Kaiwa Gakko, Kojimachi-ku, (Ernest English Conversation School) recently founded and opened by Mr. and Mrs. R. Scattergood-Kirkham have prevented them from leaving Tokyo this summer for any length of time, but their daughter, Anna Jocelyn, is leaving for Karuizawa today, with her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Carey, where she will stay with them in the resort for the season.

TRIP POSTPONED

Owing to the rainy and untavorable weather on the last Sunday, the J.A.A. excursion to Izurusan and Oohirayama has been postponed until the coming Sunday, July 18 and the program will be carried out according the original plan, leaving the J.A.A. headquarters near Babasakimon at 8 a.m. sharp.

AT KARUIZAWA

The Afghan Minister Mr. Tarzi, and his family left Tokyo for Karuizawa on Friday where they will spend Summer time at their villa No. 2408, Karuizawa.

The Kusatsu Electric Railway Company started the operation of the "Asama," the "shirakaba densha" (white birch wood electric tram), between Shin Karuizawa Station and Kyudo Station last Saturday, the 10th. The "shirakaba densha" will be in operation until the end of September. This tram will run every 20 minutes every day between Shin Karuizawa Station and Kyudo Station only.

Carp fishing at Lake Tashiro, located a few miles from Karuizawa on the Kusatsu Electric Railway Line, is becoming quite a sport, and is attracting many of the Karuizawa residents to this picturesque spot.

According to the investigation made by the Karuizawa Police Station up to Tuesday, the number of summer residents at present, 1652 residents staying here, representing 26 different countries, of which the number of Japanese residents totals the largest number, being 1146 residents, with the Germans ranking next in number with 108 residents, followed by the American, Chinese, English, Russians, and other nationalities. Foreigners total 506 residents.

Italian Papers Ordered To Publish Only 8 Pages

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

ROME, July 11—Owing to a shortage of pulp for the manufacture of paper, Italian newspapers have been ordered by the Government to restrict the size of their daily editions to eight pages beginning from the middle of this month, it was revealed in an official communique here tonight. The price of foreign pulp, the communique said, is too high to permit unrestricted import into Italy.

Roosevelt Urges Millions For Ships

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, June 8—President Roosevelt asked Congress today for $10,000,000 for the revolving fund of the Maritime Commission, and an authorization of $150,000,000 to enable the commission to begin quickly to rebuild the American merchant marine, which, he said, will be over 85 per cent obsolete in five years.

In an hour after the President made the announcement at his press conference, Chairman Kennedy of the commission revealed details of the plan.

The $160,000,000, he said, would provide for construction of ninety-five vessels, including ten fast tankers.

Business is good, Mr. Kennedy went on, and "these fellows are optimistic." Twenty-eight ships already have been proposed, and in each instance the builder has shown proof of ability to carry out the contract.

Subsidies and Low-Cost Loans

The 1936 Maritime Act provides for a construction subsidy up to 50 per cent of the differential between the cost of building in the United States and abroad, with operating differentials to enable competition with foreign ships, and long-term loans at low rates.

President Roosevelt wrote to Speaker Bankhead that "the additional appropriation and authority to make commitments are essential for launching the long-delayed rehabilitation of our merchant marine."

"Over 85 per cent of the present American merchant marine will be obsolete in five years," he wrote. "In order to carry out our policy this country must build ships immediately.

"To illustrate the problem in another way, except for oil tankers, there was not a single sea-going vessel of the passenger, combination or general cargo carrying type under construction in an American shipyard in 1936 for either the domestic or the foreign trade, and for the fifteenth consecutive year not a single sea-going ship of the general cargo carrying type has been built in an American shipyard for foreign trade. During that same period only a few cargo vessels were built for domestic sea-going trade.

"There is no sense in talking about an adequate or a first-class merchant marine in the face of such facts. For us an adequate merchant marine has to be a new merchant marine. The question comes—What are we going to do about it? The best and most modern ships—and build them right away.

Says Action Is Necessary Now

"An orderly and economical program of replacement in American shipyards in accordance with the statute requires that the commission be given authority now to make commitments.

"It is not our intention to expand our merchant marine to drive out the ships of other nations. However, we must have facilities adequate for the protection of the American shipper and for purposes of national defense. As I said on March 4, 1935, in my message to the Congress on this subject:

"'Free competition among the nations in the building of modern shipping facilities is a manifestation of wholly desirable and wholesome national ambition. In such free competition the American people want us to be properly represented. The American people want to use American ships. Their government owes it to them to make certain that such ships are in keeping with our national pride and national needs.'"

One Manhattan Type Planned

The total of 95 ships that Mr. Kennedy said could be constructed included 46 cargo, C-1 type; 14 cargo, C-2; 10 passenger cargo, P-1; 10 passenger-cargo, P-2; 4 passenger-cargo, P-4; 1 Manhattan type and 10 high-speed tankers that will average about 16½ knots.

According to Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, commissioner in charge of technical and construction work, the program will extend over eighteen months to three years.

Taking part in the conference with Mr. Kennedy, Admiral Land said there are sixty-seven ways in the United States where construction work could be started, and several thousand others that would need rehabilitation.

Mr. Kennedy showed the obsolescent stage of the merchant marine as follows:

Item:	Number	Tons (Thousands).	P. C. by 1942	20 Years Old
A. Government-owned fleet	235	1,400	100
B. Domestic fleet	487	2,182	91
C. Tanker fleet	341	2,416	88
D. Foreign trade fleet	381	2,464	35
Totals	1,444	8,462	90

A. Thirty-nine active, 196 inactive. Ships of ten-knot speed predominate.
B. Ships of ten and eleven knots speed predominate.
C. Ninety per cent of those have speed of less than twelve knots.
D. Ships of ten-knot speed predominate.
Foreign ocean-mail route ships, 274; tonnage, 1,800,000. Speed of ten and eleven knots predominate.

Says They Cannot Compete

"These old and slow ships are unable successfully to meet foreign competition; even with the most liberal subsidies," Mr. Kennedy said.

"New and faster vessels would be more economical to operate, attract more and better-paying cargo, and require less aid from the government. The nation's prestige, defense, trade and income would all benefit from the new ships. We would have a prosperous as well as a competitive merchant marine in the foreign trade.

"It is estimated that a cargo-ship replacement program sufficiently comprehensive to rehabilitate our freight services operating from North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific Coast ports would necessitate an annual outlay of approximately $80,000,000 for about five years.

"Replacement of certain combination passenger and cargo ships in the important East Coast of South America trade and in other essential services would increase this amount $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 each over the first two years."

Rumanian Monarch On 6-Day Visit To Paris

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, July 11—Off on a fresh tour of northern Europe, King Carol of Rumania arrived here aboard the Orient Express from Bucharest at 8:40 this morning and is expected to remain in the French capital for six days during which he will be guest of honor at a number of state functions.

Officials revealed that President Albert Lebrun and members of the Chautemps cabinet have invited King Carol to several banquets and public functions during this week, but it was not disclosed whether any political conversations would take place. The Rumanian monarch is scheduled to resume his journey next Saturday to Brussels.

King Carol's itinerary also includes London, Stockholm and Sigmaringen, in south Germany, the original seat of the former imperial house of Hohenzollern of which the Rumanian Royal family is a branch.

Abuses In Tipping

present, has not been very fruitful.

There have been isolated instances of restaurants so strategically located that they charged the employes for the jobs they held, on the theory that the opportunities to make a good wage in tips more than offset the fee for the job. Happily, it is not a plan which has spread very widely. But the number of restaurants which pay waitresses $1 and $2 a week "with meals"—which does not mean lobster salad and strawberries, but day-before-yesterday's rice pudding and some of the less tender hamburg—would surprise you.

It is impossible to say flatly that it would be a good thing if the tipping system were totally abolished in favor of a 10 per cent service fee system, which derives from certain French usage; because in some places, not only does the tipping system work smoothly, but the employes are satisfied. It is like all things that ought not to be generalized about. But it seems certain that considerable good can be worked by having statutes to provide in places where employes do not get the tips the public thinks they get, to have signs, hung conspiculously, to say so. Then, if the patron wants to stuff the pockets of some concessionaire, as a return for a bright smile or a witty word bestowed by the pretty girl who does all the work, that is his business, and there can be no complaints that the tip wouldn't have been what it was "if I had known where it was going."

Nothing New

Laws affecting tipping are nothing new. They are revivals. Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee and Washington all used to have laws against any tipping at all. Iowa was the standout maintaining a statute making tipping a misdemeanor after the other states had been obliged to repeal theirs.

Tipping is no modern source of grievance, either. Samuel Johnson mentioned his ability to obtain extra good service by including a tipping item in his dining-out budget. Old English inns used to keep a box, painted conspicuously bright and nailed conspicuously to the wall where no one would miss it, which had the initials "T. I. P." on it. The initials were supposed to stand for "To insure promptness" and money for the inn servants went into the box.

People exclaim, with irritation, "Well, what am I to do? Tip or not tip? And, if I do tip, how much should I tip?"

The best answer to the questions is a blanket one. Observe the custom of the place you are in. Remember that, in general, 10 per cent of the bill is correct, if the bill is for a respectable amount. You would hardly leave six cents for a bill of 65 cents. If you dined alone in a good hotel, you would not leave your waiter less than 25 cents, and you would be a little more considerate of him if it were 35 cents. That is unless you had terrapin and canvas backs. If you are two, you wouldn't leave less than 50 cents. It may sound a little quaint, but try putting yourself in the place of the person rendering the service, bearing in mind the fairly reasonable complaint of people who depend on tips that it is the person who exacts the most service who usually tips the least. Whether the tipping system is an evil or not, it is not nice to expect a great deal of service and give nothing in return.

Taxi Drivers

Taxi drivers can tell one a thing or two about the indestructibility of non-tippers. In these days in New York a taxi driver is fortunate if he makes $8.50 in a week for his regular work. It wouldn't seem that it would do any harm for people who ride in cabs to add a little to that. Ask the drivers if they like long hauls or short—on the theory that a short haul should produce at least a 10 cent tip and give the driver a chance at new business quickly—and the answer probably will be "Lady, I'll take anything I can. Long or short, it don't make no difference, to me, just so's I get it. I'm tellin' you, drivin' a cab these days is sump'n!"

Get them talking and they'll tell about people who ask them, at 1 o'clock in the morning, if they'd "be willing" to drive them to Long Island for $5 from upper Manhattan.

"Say, lady, I'd drive to Pittsburgh for a $5 bill, the way things are these days!"

"Tips?"

"You'd be surprised, lady, how many people think they've done you a favor to get in your cab. When they pay you 30 cents or whatever it is, they look at you like tigers, in case you'd show you'd like a tip! I guess they figure they'll scare you out of it!"

The NY American Quits As Daily

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, June 23.—The New York American, Hearst daily morning newspaper, as such will publish its last issue tomorrow. Beginning on Friday the daily issue will be consolidated with The New York Journal in the evening and with The New York Mirror in the morning field, it is disclosed in an announcement in today's New York American.

The announcement confirms rumors that have been current throughout the city for the past week. The management's announcement explains that the New York American's Associated Press membership and New York City News Association daily franchise, as well as many of its daily features, will be transferred to The New York Daily Mirror.

Sunday Features to Journal

The Sunday American, "with all its features and with its Associated Press membership and other press association franchises," the announcement continues, "and further enlarged and improved by many added Journal attractions, will be published in conjunction with The Evening Journal."

"Many of the daily features of The New York American will appear in The New York Evening Journal," it goes on. "The numerous pages of classified advertising will be transferred to the Journal, together with the many special departments and contributors, including financial writers.

"The practical disadvantages of maintaining three competing newspapers in one community make a combination of this kind desirable and beneficial.

"The creation of two powerful papers of enlarged size with many added pages and features will be of immense advantage not only to The Mirror and The Journal but to the reading public. Furthermore, the largest measure of employment possible will be maintained."

The title to be used by the consolidated Sunday edition and New York Evening Journal has not been definitely decided, it was explained by H. M. Bitner, general manager of the Hearst Enterprises, Inc. The Sunday and evening combination may be known as The New York Journal and Sunday American.

Mirror Still to Be Tabloid

The New York Mirror will continue to be published in tabloid form.

The passing of The New York American as such marks the withdrawal of William Randolph Hearst from the standard daily morning newspaper field in this city, in which he had been active for forty-two years.

Having achieved success with the San Francisco Examiner, Mr. Hearst at the age of thirty-three entered the metropolitan newspaper field in New York City when he purchased the New York Morning Journal from John R. McLean, publisher of the Cincinnati Enquirer. Mr. Hearst is reported to have paid $18,000 to Mr. McLean who a little more than a year previously had purchased the Morning Journal for $1,000,000 from Albert Pulitzer, brother of Joseph Pulitzer, publisher of The New York World.

Mr. Hearst acquired title to the New York Morning Journal on Sept. 25, 1895. He lowered the price from 2 cents to 1 cent, and took an active part in the collection of news and make-up of the news pages. Within three months he pushed the circulation from 20,000 to 150,000.

Mr. Hearst's first offices in New York were in the Pulitzer Building, owned by his principal newspaper rival. Later he moved to the Tribune Building next door on Nassau Street where he continued to print The Journal.

Hired Leading Writers

Among outstanding newspaper men that Mr. Hearst attracted to his publication soon after he entered the New York City field were Morrill Goddard and Arthur Brisbane who in turn had been Sunday editors of The World; S. S. Carvalho, The World's business manager; Richard F. Outcault, comic strip artist; Edgar Saltus, Stephen Crane, James Creelman, Robert H. (Rob) Davis, Julian Hawthorne, son of Nathaniel Hawthorne; Alan Dale, W. J. Henderson, Richard Harding Davis, Alfred Henry Lewis and Ring Lardner.

Mr. Hearst continued to publish The New York Morning Journal. To increase circulation and obtain an Associated Press membership he purchased The Morning Advertiser, which he consolidated with The Journal. Toward the end of 1901 he changed the title of his newspaper to The American and Journal. He divided the title when he began the publication of an evening newspaper to which he gave the title of The New York Evening Journal, retaining the tile of New York American for the morning publication.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

Anglo-Italian Friendship Said Up To London

By WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS

San Francisco News

ROME, June 19—Permanent estrangement between Great Britain and Italy would be a constant menace to the peace of Europe. Nowhere is this more keenly realized than here. After some time spent in London and Rome, I am entirely convinced that if relations between the two powers are not soon improved, the fault will be largely London's. If Britain desires Italy's friendship, I am confident she can have it virtually at the cost of holding out her hand.

No Gain From War

"What has Italy to gain by conflict with Great Britain?" one of the highest authorities in the country asked me. He answered the question himself: "Nothing whatever. And what has Britain to gain by conflict with Italy? Nothing."

And he shrugged, a gesture more eloquent than anything he might have put into words.

"Both countries have much to lose and nothing to gain by conflict," a foreign office spokesman said. "Britain, of course, could seal up the Mediterranean and perhaps doom Italy. Italy, on the other hand, just as surely could close the Mediterranean to Britain and perhaps doom the British Empire. But why should either country want to commit suicide?"

Believer in Sincerity

These Italian leaders were not talking just to hear themselves talk. I do not doubt their sincerity for a moment—and I believe I am not particularly naive. I've knocked about the world for a quarter of a century and talked with most of the leading statesmen. I think I know my way around. And I believe these Italians.

I believe they are sincere for a number of reasons, but one will amply suffice, namely, that it would be sheer folly for Italy to provoke a war with Britain, and she knows it.

But the reverse side of the medal is just about equally true. It is all very well to talk about the might of the British Empire. And mighty it is. But a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and Italy sits astride the feeblest link in the empire's chain. For all practical purposes, Italy today is as powerful in the Mediterranean as Britain.

Disdained by Britain

That is the brand new factor in the situation, so far as the British Empire is concerned. The Italian boot has always been right where it is now, thrust three-quarters of the way across the Mediterranean. But Britain has never paid any attention to that fact. Italy? Pooh! What could she do against Britain?

That was still the feeling in Britain as recently as 1935, when Italy marched in Ethiopia. Even then not only the British public but the British Government firmly believed that all the British lion had to do was to roar loudly enough and the Italians would scamper home.

But, to Britain's astonishment, they didn't scamper home. Instead they scampered ahead. To the dismay of British statesmen, a strong new power had taken its place in Europe—a power which henceforth will have to be reckoned with, not as a weakling but as an equal.

Changed by Machine

That is true because something other than political has happened to the world since 1914, namely mechanical progress. "Providence," said Napoleon, "marches with the big battalions."

And so, in principle, Providence used to do. But not any longer. A man sitting behind a machine gun can hold up a regiment. Italian bombers, based on Italy proper, Sicily, Sardinia, Libya and her territory along the Red Sea, Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean, could make Britain's short cut to India and the Orient impossible. With bombers overhead and submarines and mines underneath narrow waters are no longer tenable even for the greatest navies.

Britain's strategic position is not what it used to be. Mussolini's Italy and the airplane have done much to change it. And Britain hates to admit it. The "little Italian upstart" annoys her today much as did the "little Corsican upstart" a century and a quarter ago.

now travel around the world, third class. To my mind, it would pay Hawaii to get out a booklet on just what it costs to live for two weeks in Hawaii, and remember that these student tourists do not object to eating at Chinese restaurants, and the Chinese do subscribe, to the advertising of Hawaii.

These poor devils here! Many of them rely on letters they write to their home papers for a part of their expenses, and these letters tempt the rich with more money than brains to travel. (Of course, some of us in Hawaii have both money and brains.) The rich traveler has no time for press correspondence.

U.S. Debt Tops $36,000,000,000 For First Time

WASHINGTON, — The national debt passed the $36,000,000,000 mark June 15. This is the first time in the history of the United States that the debt has been this high and totaled on the above date $36,023,907,803, according to a Treasury Department statement.

The increase from the previous day's figure of $35,281,874,582 was due to the sale on June 15 of $851,056,500 in Treasury notes made necessary largely by the gold-sterilization program, and by the crediting on that date of $500,157,956 to the United States Government Life Insurance Fund in accordance with the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act of Jan. 27, 1936.

The statement showed that the gold sterilization fund had reached $975,654,677. On June 14 it was 961,403,343. At the present rate, it will pass the $1,000,000,000 mark within a few days.

Despite the new high level of the debt it is being reduuced by slightly more than $300,000,000 through retirements effective on June 16, 17 and 18, and will probably amount to about $36,300,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year on June 30.

If the approximate $1,000,000,000 of sterilized gold is deducted as an offset from that figure, it would put the national debt at the end of the year at within about $300,000,000 of the President's January budget estimate of $35,026,000,000.

The expectations that income tax collections would surpass the President's April 20 estimate of $2,105,700,000 were supported by the June 15 statement, which showed $1,734,634,202 already collected and by indictations that the next installment payment would bring more than $600,000,000.

Britain Planning Tax On Profits For Arms Revenue

By FERDINAND KUHN Jr.

N. Y. Times

LONDON, June 16—A sweeping tax of 5 per cent on business profits over £2,000 a year was submitted to the House of Commons tonight by Sir John Simon, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in an effort to meet the gigantic cost of Great Britain's rearmament program.

The new tax proposal takes the place of the ill-fated growth-of-profits levy plan, which aroused such a storm of opposition from the business world and the entire House of Commons that Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain was forced to withdraw it a fortnight ago.

Like the old tax plan, this additional burden upon business is to be known as a "national defense contribution" to emphasize the purpose for which it is needed. It will be imposed not only for one year but for the same five-year period during which the British Government will spend £1,500,000,000 on armaments.

Strategic Move Suggested

But unlike the old measure, which would have hit the "recovery" industries most heavily, the new tax will fall with equal severity upon all profits, whether they are rising, falling or remaining stationary from year to year. In this respect it is immeasurably broader than the old and would seem to show that Mr. Chamberlain was only executing a strategic withdrawal when he abandoned his previous proposals in the face of nation-wide clamor.

In discussions over the contentious growth-of-profits measure, business leaders insisted again and again that they would welcome whatever tax on profits might be needed for defense, provided it fell fairly upon all and did not involve immense accounting or administrative labor.

Now Mr. Chamberlain has taken them at their word. He and his successor at the Exchequer have made the new tax so simple that it will require only four clauses of the new Finance Bill instead of the fifteen elaborate sections that were needed to describe the former proposals.

But the new tax is burdensome all the same and, since it will be superimposed upon the existing income tax of 25 per cent, it will be virtually equivalent to raising the tax rate to 30 per cent. Taxation at such a level never has been experienced by British business except in the last year of the World War, when the government was desperately in need of new revenue.

When the new 5 per cent slice has been cut from any company's profits the next charge will be the 25 per cent of the business income tax, which in Britain applies also to undistributed profits and to dividends, which are automatically taxed at the source.

Apart from general criticism, which every new tax proposal must undergo, the government is being attacked already for proposed exemptions and other details of the new measure. It has been decided to exempt altogether lawyers, doctors, accountants and other professional persons, although there is a natural feeling in the business world that these, too, should be made to pay their share.

Public utility companies, including gas concerns and railroads, also will be exempted on the ground that their rates and hence their profits are limited by law.

Small businesses earning more than £2,000 but less than £12,000 annually will obtain relief of one-fifth of the amount by which the profits fall short of £12,000. Finally, the government proposes to remit the new tax in whole or in part in cases of industries established in depressed or so-called special areas.

Otherwise the government has thrown its net far wider than in its previous proposals. Under the old growth of profits scheme British-owned companies operating abroad, such as the immensely profitable South African gold mining companies, would have been exempt. Now the tax will apply to the profits of all business "carried on outside the United Kingdom by companies, individuals or firms ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom."

Cooperative societies will be included in the scope of the new tax, just as they were in Mr. Chamberlain's original proposals. Since cooperative already receive comparatively lenient treatment under the Income Tax Law their inclusion in the new scheme is hardly likely to make trouble for the government. It will have enough trouble from its own supporters in the business and financial world.

It remains to be seen what the man in the street will think of these tax proposals, which in their original form were intended to convince him that no inordinate profits would be permitted under the rearmament program. The effort to single out armament firms and other abnormally profitable enterprises has failed; it produced so many injustices and anomalies that Mr. Chamberlain was compelled to abandon it.

In any case Mr. Chamberlain can argue that he is making business pay not only for the safety of the Empire but for the vast program of State expenditure that is helping for the time being to make business prosperous.

Computation Of Liability

With the necessity for capital calculation eliminated, the computation of liability will be a relatively simple matter in most cases. A simple computation by The Financial Times follows:

Blank Company, Ltd., profit and loss account:

DEBTOR

Working Expenses—£10,000.
Income Tax—£8,000.
Debenture Interest—£2,000.
Interest on Loans—£1,000.
Bank Interest—£1,000.
Reserve Fund—£10,000.
Sinking Fund—£5,000.
Reserve for Bad Debts—£1,000.
Bad Debts Written Off—£1,000.
Interim Dividend—£5,000.
Wear and Tear—£5,000.
Profit—£9,000.
Total—£58,000.

Credit or Gross Profit—£50,000.
Dividends—£8,000.

"N. D. C. LIABILITY"

Profit—£9,000.
Income Tax—£8,000.
Reserve Fund—£10,000.
Sinking Fund—£5,000.
Bad Debt Reserve—£1,000.
Interim Dividend—£5,000.
Wear and Tear—£5,000.
Total—£43,000.
Less Income Tax and Wear and Tear—£8,000.
Net—£35,000.
Less Dividends—£8,000.
Total—£27,000.

Normally no more difficulty will be experienced in arriving at the amount of liability than is shown and any taxpayer can estimate with reasonable accuracy the amount he will have to pay.

The following examples are estimates of the national defense contribution that would have been paid under the original proposal and those to be paid under the new clauses.

Metropolitan-Vickers, Ltd., its profit £1,162,616, would pay £58,263 under the original proposal, £58,136 under the present plan.

Distillers Company, its profit £2,321,577, would pay £93,649 under the old plan, £116,078 under this one.

Austin Motors, its profit £653,573, would pay nothing under old plan, £27,673 under this one.

Imperial Tobacco, its profit £10,636,310, would pay £437,458 under the original plan, £531,815 under the new one.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The Karuizawa Hall (Shukaido) opened for the summer season on July 15 is in charge of Mr. K. Tsuga, representative of Miss Namba, who is unable to come here at this time. The office hours are from 9 to 12 in the morning, and 4 to 5 in the afternoon.

According to Mr. Tsuga, Karuizawa residents whether permanent or transient, may become members of the Karuizawa Hall Association upon the payment of ¥2 per season for adults and ¥1 for children under 15 years of age. Those desiring membership in both the K.S.R.A. and the Karuizawa Hall can obtain the same by purchasing the new Combined Membership Ticket at ¥4 each. These tickets are obtainable at the K.S.R.A. Office, and at the Karuizawa Hall Office. Weekly tickets for tourists will be sold beginning this year at a cost of ¥1 each. Admission to the Karuizawa Hall will be only for members of the Karuizawa Hall, or those possessing Combined Membership Tickets.

The Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai Library will be opened to the public on August 12. No admission fee will be charged.

As in the past, talkies will be screened at this hall every Thursday and Friday nights for three weeks, commencing on Thursday, July 29. The talkie shows specified below will be free of charge to holders of K. S. R. A. Combined Membership Tickets, or the Karuizawa Hall Membership Tickets. Non-members will be charged ¥1 for admission. Admission will be charged for all other talkie shows not specified below.

The program for the three weeks, beginning Thursday, July 29 are as follows:

1st Week; Thursday, July 29 and Friday, July 30. "The Texas Rangers", a Paramount Picture starring Fred MacMurray, Jack Oakie, and Jean Parker. Also Paramount Sound News, and Talkie Cartoon.

2nd Week; Thursday, August 5 and Friday, August 6. "Golgotha", a Gray Film, distributed by the Towa Shoji. Also Paramount Sound News, and Talkie Cartoon.

3rd Week; Thursday, August 12 and Friday, August 13. "The General Died at Dawn", a Paramount Picture, featuring Gary Cooper and Madeleine Carroll. Also Paramount Sound News, and Talkie Cartoon.

Labor Troubles

16, the banks' holdings of direct Government obligations increased $242,000,000, while holdings of other securities declined $87,000,000. The banks also reported an increase of $241,000,000 in loans, of which $136,000,000 was in commercial, industrial, and agricultural loans. The aggregate increase in loans and investments amounted to $396,000,000. This was accompanied by a rise of $365,000,000 in Government deposits and a decline of $183,000,000 in demand deposits.

The current issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin calls attention to the decline in the total amount of member bank deposits that has taken place since the beginning of 1937, together with important shifts in the distribution of deposits. The declines have occurred principally in deposits of the United States Government and in interbank balances. The most important factor in accounting for the decrease in deposits has been the selling of securities by the banks.

The factors that had been responsible for the decline in new security issues in recent months were still operative in May. The total amount of new flotations last month according to the compilation of The Commercial & Financial Chronicle, was only $261,000,000, as against $280,000,000 in April and $420,000,000 a year ago. The amount of new corporate capital represented, however, was greater than in May, 1936, amounting to $78,000,000, as against $33,000,000. The same comparisons hold with respect to the totals for the first five months of the year. Although the aggregate flotations so far this year are about $800,000,000 less than a year ago, the new corporate capital is more than $200,000,000 greater.

A report of exceptional interest was submitted to Congress on June 23 by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. It dealt in part with the policies of the board with respect to domestic economic conditions and in part with developments in the foreign economic situation that tended to produce a steady flow of capital to this country from abroad in 1936. The board called attention to foreign purchases of American securities, particularly in the period following the tripartite currency agreement of Great Britain, France, and the United States, and declared that "this investment movement in the final quarter of this year was the chief factor in the heavy inflow of gold from abroad." During the six weeks from the latter part of September until the middle of November, according to the report, foreign investments in American securities were made at four or five times the rate prevailing in the first three quarters of the year. Altogether, the net movement of capital to the United States from abroad from the end of 1933 to the end of 1936 amounted to $3,100,000,000.

Trade Mission

Vice President and General Manager of IBM; O. E. Braitmayer, Vice President; J. G. Philips, Secretary and Assistant Treasurer; Herbert Houston, Publisher, and L. S. Harrison, Assistant to the President.

Mr. Kadono, who is Executive Director of the Japan Economic Federation, President of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Japan, and a partner in Okura and Company of Tokyo, was unable to go to Endicott with the party last week, of which Messrs. Ishisaka and Shimoide were members.

Thomas John Watson, the new President of the International Chamber of Commerce, was born in Campbell, New York. A graduate of the Addison Academy and the Miller Commercial School of Elmira, Doctor-At-Law of Rollins College, Florida, Lafayette College, and, Rutgers University, New Jersey, Mr. Watson has been for 23 years the President of International Business Machines Corporation of New York. Under his leadership, this company, according to a survey made by the U. S. Department of Commerce, controls 87 per cent of the world's business in the tabulating machine field.

The world-famed International Electric Accounting and Statistic Tabulating Machines are produced by eleven factories located in seven countries and handled in 35 countries by 85 companies registered under the laws of each country, such as for instance the Deutsche Hollerith Maschinen Geselschaft, The Compagnie Electro-Comptable de France, the British Tabulating Machine Company, the Nippon Watson Tokei Kaikei Kikai Kabushiki Kaisha, etc.

The successful management of an organization of that size and importance would be enough to fill the life of any man but not so with Thomas J. Watson, Chairman of the American Section of the International Chamber of Commerce, Trustee of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Trustee of Lafayette College and Columbia University, Trustee of the Roosevelt and Summit Hospitals, Trustee of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, Trustee of the New York Citizens' Budget Commission, Vice-President of the New York City Economic Club, Vice-President and Executive Member of the Conference of Directors of the National Industry, Member of the Industrial Council of the NRA, Vice-President of the Pan-American Society of New York City, Director of the American Manufacturers' and Exporters' Association, New York, Director of the Grand Central Art Galleries of New York, Trustee and former President of the Merchants' Association of New York, Vice-President of the New York City Museum and Commissioner General of the U.S.A. for the Paris Exposition of 1937.

Mr. Watson's friendly attitude toward Japan is well known. It will be remembered that he greeted the members of the Japanese Economic Mission to the U.S.A. on their arrival in Chicago by a cable announcing that the 1939 meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce would be held in Japan.

The Colombian Legation has announced that it is holding no official reception Tuesday, which marks the Colombian National holiday.

ARRIVES FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Otis Draper, son of Dr. Gideon F. Draper, of Yokohama, who arrived recently from the United States spent Tuesday and Wednesday in Karuizawa this week, where the Draper family held a reunion. Mrs. P. A. Smith, sister of Mr. Draper, who resides in Osaka, went up to the mountain resort especially for the occasion. Mr. Draper is a member of the teaching staff of the Ventura Junior College, in Southern California, and has come to the Orient to conduct a party of tourists of the University Travel Bureau through Japan and China. Due to the situation in North China, where the party was to have visited, tour plans have been altered, and a trip to Manila is being considered instead. Dr. Draper, who has been in Karuizawa since the end of last month, will celebrate his 79th birthday on Tuesday.

Secured Liberties

have produced conditions, national and international, which vex the imagination and confuse the judgment.

"I am sure that these conditions are in all your thoughts and I shall not attempt to describe them. We still proclaim the old ideals of liberty but we cannot voice them without anxiety in our hearts.

"The question is no longer one of establishing democratic institutions, but of preserving them. The question is no longer one of triumphing over sectional discords and unifying the nation, but whether a united people, putting forth its great strength for national ends, will leave appropriate scope for individual freedom. The question is not one of the adequate power of government, designed to keep clear the highways of honest endeavor, but how that power shall be used.

"Safe as we may still be in the present, what of the look ahead?

"Are our democratic impulses growing weaker, and under the pressure of economic forces and the insidious teachings of an alien philosophy, will our democracy be able to survive?

"These questions should not find response in a pessimistic surrender but should quicken the resolve to treasure and utilize to their fullest extent the resource of reason. Put no confidence in mere forms or in institutional arrangements, however astutely contrived in the interest of liberty. All these arrangements depend upon the popular will.

"Brown University has an exceptional heritage. Here, bred in the traditions of this Commonwealth dedicated to civil and religious liberty, our university fathers set up, 173 years ago the standard of freedom of learning.

"That freedom had a definite aim, expressed in the language of our famous charter, 'to preserve in the community a succession of men duly qualified for discharging the offices of life with usefulness and reputation.'

"The college should be the power house of a beneficent civic energy. The primary function of the college is not specialization but to afford stimulus and guidance in obtaining the general culture without which specialized effort is likely to miss the happiest fruition. It is through that 'enlargement of outlook and capacities, both of apprehension and appreciation,' as an eminent educator recently put it, and the extension of that cultural process in the midst of the strenuous demands of an active life, that enables one to render 'the most fruitful service to the social order.'"

Princeton Honors

tion in the fundamentals and developing standards of high scholarship, with the result that, his school, as judged by the performance of its graduates here, stands in the first rank of secondary schools in the country.

Doctor of Engineering

STEPHEN FRANCIS VOORHEES, a Princeton graduate in civil engineering of the class of 1900, and since 1930 supervising architect of the university; past president of the American Institute of Architects, chairman of the Advisory Board on Vocational and Industrial Education of the Board of Education of New York City, chairman of the Board of Design to plan and supervise the construction of the World Fair in New York in 1939; a companionable associate with contagious good humor, an artist in design with abundant knowledge of the technique of construction, a creator of cathedrals for business as notable for their beauty of line and ornament as for their magnitude and efficiency.

Doctor of Science

ERNEST ORLANDO LAWRENCE, Professor of Physics in the University of California, graduate of the University of South Dakota, the University of Minnesota and Yale, for two years a National Research Fellow, appointed Assistant Professor at Yale in 1927, one year later called to the University of California; elected to the National Academy of Sciences and the American Philosophical Society in recognition of his investigations in the field of nuclear physics, made possible by his invention of the cyclotron, which has opened up a new field in experimental physics with possibilities of great value in medical radiology, similar machines being constructed in many lands. An experimenter of rare technical skill and ingenuity, creator of a powerful instrument to discover the secrets of the minute atom, director and inspirer of many students, he has been acclaimed throughout the scientific world a physicist of the highest rank.

Doctor of Letters

CHAUNCEY BREWSTER TINKER, Sterling Professor of English Literature in Yale University and Keeper of Rare Books in the Yale Library; sometime Vanuxem Lecturer at Princeton, and for next year Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard. A graduate of Yale in the Class of '99, for over three decades he has served his university with distinction as teacher and scholar. Although he has sailed the northern seas with Beowulf's sturdy band of warriors, and has listened with Matthew Arnold to the "long withdrawing roar" of the Victorian surf on Dover Beach, he is first and foremost a citizen of Dr. Johnson's London. To his painstaking and brilliant study of Johnson's great biographer we owe the recovery of Boswell's journals and private papers long lost to view in an Irish castle. A student of the art of literature and, in his own right, a literary artist; to the students in his class room and to the world at large in his writings, he speaks with grace of utterance and sureness of critical judgment, the fruit of wide knowledge and mature thought directed and controlled by an unerring sense of abiding values.

Doctor of Divinity

JOHN ALXANDER MACKAY, President of the Princeton Theological Seminary; a native of Scotland, Master of Arts of Aberdeen and Bachelor of Divinity of the Princeton Theological Seminary; while serving as Educational Missionary of the Presbyterian Church in South America and Principal of the Anglo-Peruvian College of Lima for nearly a decade, he continued his studies in philosophy, begun with high distinction at Aberdeen, and later was Professor of Philosophy at the National University of Peru; recently Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Another Scottish philosopher and divine has come to Princeton to assume executive duties; we anticipate an administration marked by the modesty and dignity of the true scholar and of one who ever presses "toward the mark of the high calling."

Doctor of Laws

CHARLES EZRA BEURY, President of Temple University; a graduate of Princeton of the Class of '30 and of the Harvard Law School; practiced law and later banking until he was attracted by a great and difficult opportunity—to carry on and develop an institution founded upon the idea that the future of a democracy depends upon the provision of collegiate and professional education for all having the desire and capacity for it, and at a cost commensurate with their ability to pay, so that their self-respect be mantained; this he has done with the devoted assistance of his associates, using to the utmost his financial knowledge and executive skill, raising the standards with increasing enrollment, true to the vision and ideals of the founder.

Stokowski Lauds Screen As Medium For Finest Music

"The spiritual development of America has become the responsibility of Hollywood," according to Leopold Stokowski, noted orchestra leader.

The conductor, now in Hollywood for his role with Deanna Durbin in Universal's "100 Men and a Girl," made the statement when a press correspondent asked why the world-renowned leader of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra had identified himself with the screen.

"It has always been my aim to present the greatest music to the greatest number of people," Stokowski continued. "How can this be done to better advantage than through the medium of the screen?

"Through the motion picture, a nation, already physically mature, can be fed the great music which will bring to it spiritual maturity. It is my privilege now to aid in that great development, toward that magnificent end. It is all a logical step in the spiritual growth of America!"

'Slow Haste' Urged In Britain On Gold

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, June 22.—From the British point of view, the short-term problem of "what to do about gold" presents little difficulty. On the contrary, there is a strong case for making no early change in the present monetary policy of the British Government not to reduce the sterling price of gold, according to a leading article in The Economist of London for June 12.

Nevertheless, from the long-term viewpoint, the publication finds that "the present plan of purchase and segregation by the American and British authorities is not a permanent solution—for it cannot be contemplated that public resources will be used indefinitely in the purchase of unwanted gold."

Recent statements by President Roosevelt and Sir John Simon that no change in the monetary policies of their respective nations is contemplated have, for the moment, allayed the gold scare, The Economist maintains. Continuing, the publication says:

"Sir John Simon made it clear that official British purchases of gold were an integral part both of our general monetary policy and of the ways in which we are carrying out our responsibilities under the tripartite monetary agreement.

A Concurrence of Views

"He also attributed much of the recent offerings of gold in London to dishoarding. This view is supported both by City impressions and by the statistics of gold movements which we published last week. In any case, rapid dishoarding is a natural consequence of a general fear of an impending reduction in the price of gold.

"It may be expedient, therefore, to view the gold problem once more in perspective. The question, clearly, has both a short-term and a long-term aspect," The Economist continues. It points out that President Roosevelt cannot reduce the gold price more than a fraction without new legislation, "which for various reasons is at present impracticable," and that such action by Great Britain would be a unilateral act contrary to the spirit of the tripartite agreement.

It would also involve overvaluation of the pound against the dollar and the French franc and inflict a loss upon South Africa and other gold-producing dominions, and the article adds that, "in other words, such action would be a political impossibility."

"Psychological considerations must also be taken into account. The past two months have proved only too clearly that a reduction in the price of gold, which, rightly or wrongly, is interpreted as a deflationary measure by industry and the markets.

"Stable Value" a Factor

"Any attempt to wean the public from this belief might succeed only in teaching the public that gold no longer possessed a stable value, either in terms of money or commodities, and unless the present widespread belief in the value of gold is replaced by something equally assured the undermining of this faith would inevitably lead to uncertainty and caution in business circles generally.

"Moreover, there is, as yet, no imperative need of action. The recent flood of gold on the London market has been mainly due to dishoarding. This process cannot go on indefinitely, and we may soon be within measurable distance of its end.

"Again, it is reasonable that we in this country should accumulate considerable supplies, for part of the Exchange Fund gold is really earmarked against 'hot' money, and in that sense is not redundant.

"In fact, some statisticians claim that at present we have not a real surplus of gold at all. We must allow an adequate cover for our future note circulation. There may be future gold losses in respect of the Empire's balance of payments. Given further revival in world trade, the Empire central banks may need to replenish their gold reserves at home. India may resume hoarding and we ourselves may resume lending abroad.

"Mr. Keynes, indeed, in The Times of June 10, urges that we should accelerate and encourage some of these movements. If we also allow for the repatriation of 'hot' money, these considerations suggest that there will be little margin left out of the gold held today by the Bank of England and the Exchange Equalization Account."

Long-Term Problem More Acute

The long-term problem is more difficult to disentangle, however, the article continues.

"The present price of gold is very profitable to producers," it finds, "and, for the time being at all events, Russia has become a source of supply comparable in importance to the Rand itself.

"If equilibrium could only be restored by an increase in costs proportionate to the rise in the price of gold it would mean an inflation in the price level far greater than is desirable. We must assume, therefore, that unless the price of gold is reduced we must be prepared to deal with a steadily increasing output, without allowing it to have its full effect upon priecs.

"The present plan of purchase and segregation by the American and British authorities is not a permanent solution—for it cannot be contemplated that public resources will be used indefinitely in the purchase of unwanted gold.

"If the price of gold is not to be lowered, there are two ways in which the long-term problem might be solved. One is that gold should be absorbed by more of the central banks, by Germany and by other countries that are not holding their normal proportion of the world's gold stock. The second method is an international agreement for the control of production."

This alone would not solve the problem. The Economist opines, and it adds that while new output from the mines is an important factor, the valuation of the world's huge stock is of far greater moment.

"The root of the trouble is that when the United States went off gold in 1933 it did not wait long enough for a new equilibrium to establish itself, but fixed a new price of gold which revalued the reserves of the whole world at a level that has proved to be too high," the article holds. "The world's central banks are now counterbalancing this overvaluation by raising the percentage of reserves or setting gold aside in special funds. The difficulty would be more easily dealt with—though it would not be completely solved—if new production were under control."

The drastic surgical remedy of a reduction in the price of gold may be avoided, possibly but not certainly, "if we play for time," the analysis continues.

"Meanwhile there is a strong current of City opinion in favor of stabilization. This, it is claimed, would stop dishoarding, remove the fear of deflation, settle the gold market and allow recovery to be resumed. But this is a short view.

"The present controversy on the price of gold shows that there is grave doubt whether the present is the right gold price at which to stabilize. If we fix at this figure with the intention of changing it if it proves an unsuitable lever, confidence in the price will be lacking, and dishoarding will go on and production will continue to rise so long as the price remains high.

"If we contemplate lowering the price before stabilization, we must immediately face a period of setback and hesitation. In any case, the preliminary conditions so frequently laid down as necessary before Great Britain can stabilize are not yet present. Having waited so long, it would be a great mistake to take the plunge and risk the fixing of a new level while the French situation is still unresolved and Germany's intentions quite unknown.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The Asbury Radio Male Quartet, known on the air as "The Asbury Ambassadors of the Air," will make its debut in a muscial concert at the Karuizawa Auditorium at 8:00 p.m. Tuesday, under the auspices of the Karuizawa Summer Residents' Association.

This Male Quartet is on the last leg of its world tour, and is to make its final appearance in Karuizawa before returning back to the United States July 31. This famous quartet is from the Asbury College, Wilmore, Kentucky, and is composed of the following members: Mr. William Gilliam, first tenor; Mr. Boyd Macrory, second tenor; Mr. Joseph Cruse, first bass; and Mr. John Seamands, second bass.

No admission will be charged for K. S. R. A. members, but for non-members, there will be a charge of 50 sen per person.

Miss Yaeko Ichinomiya, popular Japanese jazz-singer under contract to the Shochiku Theatrical company, will make her Karuizawa appearance at the New Grand Lodge dinner-dance at 6:30 p.m. today. The music will be furnished by the Kawashima Novelty Jazz Orchestra.

Among those who have made reservations for this gala affair, is Captain John Weckerling, Assistant Military Attache of the American Embassy, who will be joint host with other United States Army Officers to his many friends at a farewell dinner-dance party in honor of the American Military attache and Mrs. Carey Crane.

Four different parties of the World Education Conference Delegation, conducted by Thos. Cook and Sons, will visit Shiga Kogen (Shiga Plateau) next week, between Sunday and Thursday.

Registrants at the Karuizawa Main Post Office, Friday, were:—

had been left between the divisions for this progress, and their Majesties four times passed along the full span of the gathering. The horses were slowed down almost to a walk, and the inspection occupied half an hour. Cheering was continuous and cordial as their Majesties made the round of the veterans.

"Great Brotherhood"

Back on the dais, the King took a position before the microphone and, speaking slowly and distinctly, addressed the great gathering.

"I am very pleased," his Majesty said, "to see so many old comrades here today. I appreciate your having come, both men and women, in such large numbers, many of you from long distances, and I hope that you will take away lasting memories of this great gathering.

"I am happy to think that, as patron, I am in the future to be associated with the work of some of those bodies which make up the great brotherhood of ex-Service men. Being one of that brotherhood myself, I have always followed their progress with real interest and sympathy. I have especially welcomed the interchange of visits between the ex-Service men of other countries and ourselves. Those of us who have seen war know what a great calamity it is for victors and vanquished alike, and if, with the united weight of our experience, we can convince the world of this fact, then I feel we can render no greater service to the human race."

"Some among you have not known the tragedy of war, and, I pray God, never will. For you, too, there is a task to perform. It is not only in times of common danger that we need the fellow-feeling so lavishly outpoured during those dark years. The spirit of unselfishness and sympathy is just as necessary now for the welfare of mankind in our daily life, and it is up to you, and to all of us, to see that this spirit is never allowed to fade. These are not easy tasks, but we must all do our best to carry them out; and by setting this example to our fellow men we shall win honor and glory for the proud name of ex-Service man.

"The Queen and I wish every one of you prosperity and happiness. For us this gathering will always remain one of the most outstanding events of our Coronation Year."

Disabled Men

At the end of the address Lord Milne called for three cheers for the King, and these were given by the parade with a roar which lost nothing in enthusiasm because of reverberations on the fringes of the gathering due to delayed startings. Their Majesties, with Queen Mary and the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, then left the dais and walked to an enclosure where about 1,000 disabled ex-Service men were assembled. The Queen, a little in advance of the group, immediately entered into conversation with veterans reclining in spinal carriages, and their Majesties spent some time greeting and questioning the company prevented by physical incapacity from sharing in the final stage of the review.

From the enclosure the King and Queen proceeded to a second platform, facing the East Carriage Drive, for the long march past of the men and women whom they were to honor while honor in turn was given. The march was led by Major-General Sir Frederick Maurice, president of the British Legion, and the national executive of the Legion. At the start the bands played the tune "Colonel Bogey," and this was followed by one familiar song after another. As each country division, with its massed standards, approached the saluting base, a leader stepped out of the procession to be presented to the King and Queen and to stand with his Majesty while the section filed by. There was a special burst of cheering when General Sir Hubert Gough approached at the head of the veterans of the Fifth Army, and when the general was called to the dais the men raised shouts of "Good old Gough" and "Good old Fifth Army." Nearly all the contingents had friends and relatives in the stands opposite the Royal platform, and the accents of many parts of Britain were heard in the exchange of greetings, between the moving columns and spectators.

The march past revealed how representative was the gathering reviewed by the King. In numbers the British Legion was substantially first, but regimental associations had their groups and such bodies as the Corps of Commissionaires, the United Services Corps, and the Legion of Frontiersmen were among those who saluted the King. There were also 600 representatives of the ex-Service women's organizations. The most touching incident of the march came when 200 blinded men, led by Captain Sir Ian Fraser, went by with linked arms and stewards with the happiness of sight at the end of each rank to guide the sightless.

Among those who had places in the special enclosures for the review were Mr. Hore-Belisha, Secretary of State for War, General Sir Harry Knox, Lieutenant-General Sir Reginald May, Sir Herbert Creedy, Admiral of the Fleet Sir Roger Keyes, M.P., Admiral Sir Martin Dunbar-Naismith, Air Marshal Sir Frederick Bowhill, General Sir Walter Braithwaite, and the High Commissioners for Australia, New Zealand, and Southern Rhodesia.

Offices of this advisory committee on education are set up in the old Department of Interior Building in Washington, and an expert staff is ready for service. Original investigations will be made, especially in the administration of education in each State.

Other studies will be carried on in cooperation with the Office of Education, the National Resources Committee, the American Youth Commission and the Educational Policies Commission of the National Education Association.

Experts who will direct various phases of the studies include Dr. Paul R. Mort, Columbia University; Dr. Newton Edwards, University of Chicago; Walter D. Cocking, formerly Tennessee Commissioner of Education; Payson Smith, Harvard University; Doak S. Campbell, George Peabody College for Teachers; Raymond S. Hughes, president emeritus, Iowa State College; Paul T. David; John D. Russell, University of Chicago, and Lloyd E. Blauch.

The educators here for the convention feel the more optimistic as to the final outcome of the advisory committee's survey of Federal aid because it is understood that the original committee made a report to the President advocating not only the continuance but the increase of Federal aid to vocational education.

Sessions of the convention began this afternoon with a vesper service, addressed by the Rev. Dr. Halford E. Luccock of the Yale Divinity School.

He urged the teachers to defend their academic freedom vigorously and to bring social thinking "into line with the realities of the material framework of our civilization," in their teaching.

"There must e no yielding," he said, "to the seductive picture of education recently presented, of a back-tracking to the Middle Ages, where in a philosophic calm the main content of education would be authority and tradition remote from the urgent complexities of contemporary life. This is too much like regulating life at the nod of a mummy."

In regard to academic freedom he said:

"The campaign for suppression or repression of thought and speech, with its manifestations of teachers' oaths and witch-hunting, at the behest of some self-appointed Caesars, either a Legislature or newspaper publisher or overheated professional patriots, constitutes a veritable barbarian invasion of American schoolrooms and campuses.

"It is important to remember that teachers' oath legislation in Germany and Italy was a first means by which fascism got its death grip on the intellectual and spiritual life of those countries."

Two candidates are in the field for the office of president of the N. E. A. next year. They are Miss Caroline Woodruff, president, State Teachers College, Castleton, Ct., and Miss Amy Hinrichs, principal, Audubon School, New Orleans.

European Countries

agitates the Continental atmosphere, England, across the Channel, also finds it chafing. Time and again Russian and German broadcasts have provided sparks for bitter debates in Parliament.

Though outwardly independent, the British Broadcasting Company, a monopoly, constantly is conscious of close governmental interests. It was mainly as a result of pressure from the Colonial and Dominion Offices that, eight months ago, a start was made to elevate Daventry to leadership among short-wave broadcasters.

Power-Plus

Reports the British United Press: "Officially, the Corporation states that the three new high-powered transmitters ordered for Daventry are capable of an output of 50,000 watts, but, in fact, their maximum power will be 100,000 watts. . . .

"The B.B.C. is fully aware of every propaganda broadcast given by a foreign nation. At the receiving station at Tatsfield, Surrey, engineers are engaged day and night in picking up and recording foreign programs, the most provocative and outstanding of which are sent to Broadcasting House to be studied by high officials of the Corporation and, if necessary, passed on to the Foreign Office."

The same source also relates that "particular concern is being felt regarding the present activities of the German short-wave station at Zeesen, which transmits highly colored news-bulletins in English to the African Continent daily."

Sounding-Post

Aloof Britain, in the main, merely listens to the radio war disturbing Europe and is content to consolidate her outlets, but is building to reach the farthest domains of her Empire as part of colonial policy by broadcasting only in English.

Wide-Spread

The Believe-It-Or-Not cartoon appears in 325 American and foreign daily and Sunday papers and is translated into thirteen languages in thirty-eight countries. Reportedly it is the only newspaper-syndicate feature which continued to rise in circulation throughout the depression. No paper ever has canceled its subscription.

The combined paid daily circulation of papers using Ripley cartoons is 17,830,869, according to audit figures in the Editor & Publisher "Year-Book."

Ripley's favorite sports are handball and amateur boxing. His pets are a blue collie, Flash; a coach-dog, Snag, and a cocker spaniel, Dolcy. He eschews politics and turned down an offer from the Democratic Party of Mamaroneck to run for Mayor. "Don't have time," he says. The cartoonist's hobbies are art-collecting; traveling and remaining a bachelor.

"I am quite as susceptible to feminine charms as the average man," he admits, "but just about the time I become interested in a woman I have to dash off on another long trip and when I get back she is married to somebody else. When I retire to my serai in Mamaroneck I hope to grow old gracefully with a dear wife for a companion. By that time no woman will have me."

Mr. Chamberlain A Cordwainer

London Times

LONDON, June 29.—The honorary freedom and livery of the Cordwainer's Company was conferred yesterday on Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Prime Minister. Members of the Chamberlain family have belonged to the Guild for some 200 years, and Sir Austen Chamberlain was Master of the Guild at the time of his death.

Lord Baldwin, who is an honorary assistant of the Company, moved the resolution to make the presentation. The Lord Mayor was present, and the Master, Mr. F. T. Miller, presided at the meeting of the court at which the ceremony took place.

The Master said that the Chamberlain family had provided no fewer than seven masters. The first was William Chamberlain, in 1796.

Lord Baldwin said that a shadow over-hung the ceremony. When he was invited by their friend and master, Sir Austen Chamberlain, he was looking forward to a gathering at which the master would have received the brother; but it was not to be. That was the shadow. But behind the shadow was the great honor and pleasure of moving the resolution which would commend his friend, the Prime Minister.

Continuity of Habits

It was an extraordinary good thing for the Prime Minister to be closely associated with one of the Companies of the City of London. It was a good thing for more than one reason. It was a constant reminder to them not only of the continuity of our English history but of the continuity, which was much more interesting, in the habits and customs and mentality of that strange creature—and he was proud to be one—the Englishman. It was a commonplace to say that the old craft guilds of the City took care of their crafts, of their craftsmen, of their journeymen, and of their apprentices.

They were occupied, as were the minds of the people today, with obtaining a fair price, with seeing that the craftsmanship was good and with the penalizing of bad work. Those things were examples; but they were all good, and we felt the reaction of them today. But there were one or two other things which linked us with the past.

They would have noticed—he would take the shipbuilding trade as a most prominent instance—that they had industrial troubles arising from the rival claims of craft unions whose work overlapped. And the old gentlemen who read their Morning Post in the clubs were found snorting, and saying, "the Bolshies are at it again"—(laughter)—when all that had really happened was what had happened from the beginning of time in this country. The Cordwainers ought to know all about it, for they had had to deal with the rival claims of the Curriers and the Cobblers. They had to determine where the limitations came—where they began and where they ended. The Cordwainers were the aristocrats who dealt in new leather; but when they came to maintaining whose statutes which told when and where to use new and old leather—no wonder that was a fertile source of trouble in the old days between those craft guilds.

Englishmen Unchanged

That was exactly what was happening today, because human nature remained unchanged by any modern improvements or anything that could be done to the Englishman. (Laughter.) So they need not imagine for one moment that "the Bolshies" were going to take control of the country.

When Mr. Chamberlain became honorary freeman he would belong to a Company which went back to times when the master and 26 liverymen used their bows at Agincourt, and there were not many bodies that could say that of those who preceded them. From his own experience he knew that when one first became Prime Minister one felt that there was nothing one was incapable of accomplishing. As a good Cordwainer Mr. Chamberlain would want to use new leather and make all things new. (Laughter.) He was afraid, however, that in this world there was always a lot of botching and cobbling to be done. (Laughter.) Yet it might well be that he would have to use old leather in his Cabinet and in his methods. He hoped that the Prime Minister might never be called up before the court for paying more attention to cobbling than to cordwaining. But such things lay in the future.

Mr. Chamberlain, having been clothed with the livery, sworn, and presented with the certificate of freedom, returned thanks. He said that he was deeply sensible of the honor which had been conferred upon him. It was a great grief to him that his brother did not live to take part in the ceremony. The last letter he had from his brother was upon the subject. The fact that he was Prime Minister had been mentioned, but he liked to think that the invitation to become a freeman was extended months before that event took place and when they could not possibly have known it would take place. Nor was it given him because he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was because of his long family connection with the Company.

200-Year Link

As had been said, that connection went back for over 200 years. Since 1739 there had never been a time when some member of the family was not a member of the court. Although he could not boast of the blueness of his blood or of the fame of his forebears, he was prouder of being descended from those respectable tradesmen of the eighteenth century than if his ancestors had worn shining armor and carried great swords. (Hear, hear.) It was many years since they ceased to have anything to do with the business of the cordwainer. So far as he had been able to discover, it was not a very profitable one. Even in its palmy days the profits were never large enough to have qualified her liability to N.D.C. had N.D.C. then been in existence. (Laughter.)

They found other ways of keeping body and soul together in another place; but they had not forgotten their old connections. He was the latest recruit to their ranks, and he was glad to know that the connection would be continued by his brother's descendants.

Replying to a vote of thanks, Lord Baldwin said that there was one joy in retiring from office—it made him feel so independent. When he read the words on the order of proceedings "Lord Baldwin will reply" he said to himself "Oh! Will he?" (Laughter.) But he thought better of it. (Laughter.)

On the occasion of a musical tour in South America, Mr. Yoshie Fujiwara, well known tenor singer gave a farewel recital at the Hibiya Public Hall, at 7:30 p.m. Saturday under the auspices of the Victor Concert Bureau. He sang several selections from Grand Opera, Japanese songs and Brazilian songs with the piano accompaniment by Mr. Saburo Tada. The tenor singer was warmly applauded by the audience. He had been on a musical tour in America and Europe since last winter and returned to Japan some time ago. Mr. Fujiwara decided to visit South America and left Tokyo for Moji to take the O.S.K. liner for Buenos-Aires at 11 p.m. Saturday after the farewel recital was over. The hall was full and he gave some encores to reply the public demands.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

Despite a light shower Saturday, a large crowd, estimated about 200 persons, poured into the New Grand Lodge for the week-end dinner-dance and literally packed the hall. The Kawashima Novelty 8-piece Jazz Orchestra provided the music for the evening, winning the applause of the many guests present. This first dinner-dance which ended in the wee hours of the morning, marked the formal opening of the social calendar for Karuizawa.

Among the celebrities at this first big social event of this season were the American Ambassador, Mr. Joseph Clark Grew, and other prominent officials of the American Embassy in Tokyo.

Party reservations were numerous, the largest being the farewell dinner and dance party given in honor of Lieutenant-Colonel and Mrs. Carey Crane, who are to leave for the United States sometime in August, by the Army officials of the American Embassy. The hosts and hostesses of the evening were: Captain and Mrs. John Weckerling, Captain and Mrs. Maxwell D. Taylor, Captain and Mrs. Alexander George, Captain and Mrs. Merritt B. Booth, Captain and Mrs. Elmer E. Count, Lieutenant and Mrs. Eric H. F. Svensson, and Lieutenant and Mrs. Kai E. Rasmussen. Those present at this party consisting of seventy-one guests, were: Mr. Joseph Clark Grew, Captain A. B. Lasswell, Major Creswell, Captain and Mrs. Bemis, Commander Ofstie, Lieutenant G. M. Richardson, Lieutenant Joseph Finnegan, Commander and Mrs. A. D. Merriman, Lieutenant F. D. Jordan, Lieutenant R. W. Beadler, Lieutenant M. R. Stone, Miss Yukiko Ozaki, Mrs. L. C. Dennis, Miss Eleanor Child, Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Wistrand, Miss Y. Nishimura, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Dooman, Miss Nadege Brunel, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Warner, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Curtis, Miss Betty Pearce, Miss Ellen Downes, Mr. Buck, Mr. and Mrs. T. E. Hugo Valvanne, Mr. and Mrs. Willy Noebel, Mr. and Mrs. R. General Conditions commodity prices continues, after a moderate strengthening in May, which was largely the result of a rise in the prices of iron and steel. Many commodities, such as cotton, rubber, and non-ferrous metals, suffered a decline in that month. The price index compiled by the Economist stood at 84.2 on June 16, based on the 1927 average as 100, as compared with 86.2 a fortnight earlier and 86.0 a month earlier.

France

Financial and business quarters in France have been in a highly unsettled state during the last few weeks. Several factors have contributed to the uncertainty in the country, including the badly disturbed condition in domestic political and economic affairs, the Spanish conflict and its possible effect on European peace, and rumors of a reduction in the price of gold in the United States and Great Britain.

For the third time since the Blum Government came into power, it was called upon to face major financial problems early this month. Last September a financial emergency was met by devaluing the franc, and this spring the Treasury issued an 8,000,000,000-franc loan at 4½ per cent to meet national defense expenditures. At present the country is confronted with the necessity of raising more funds either by borrowing or by additional taxation to meet its expenses during the remainder of the year. In order to meet the impending crisis, Premier Blum presented a bill to the Chamber of Deputies that would have given the Government full powers to deal with the situation; and this measure was approved by the Chamber.

The Senate immediately voted against the bill that had been approved by the lower house and on June 21 also defeated a substitute measure. Premier Blum's Cabinet resigned shortly after this defeat. On the same day, President Lebrun requested M. Chautemps, Secretary of State in the retiring Government, to form a new Cabinet. This difficult task was successfully completed on June 22, but only after M. Blum had persuaded the national council of the Socialist party to participate in a Popular Front Cabinet under the direction of the Radical Socialists. The former Premier will occupy the office of Vice President of the Council of Ministers without portfolio.

In an attempt to strengthen confidence in the position of the Treasury, the Minister of Finance issued a statement at the end of April to the effect that the original estimate of expenditures had been cut by 6,000,000,000 francs, leaving 20,247,000,000 francs to be met during the last nine months of this year. The deficit is now estimated at 11,558,000,000 francs, but this figure does not include the 4,302,000,000-franc railway loan in London due in December or the October maturities of the 4½ per cent bonds of 1934.

Confidence in industrial quarters has been weakened by the retarding effect of higher prices on consumption, the advancing cost of raw materials, the renewals of labor agreements, and the existence of speculative inventories. However, of registered unemployed receiving relief on May 1 was 368,331, which marks a decline of almost 17 per cent below the level a year earlier.

Germany

Financial markets in the Reich were temporarily upset last month by the Deutschland-Almeria incident and the fear of a reduction in the price of gold, and security markets suffered a downward reaction. However, order was soon restored when the Government announced that it regarded the Spanish affair as closed and would take no further retaliatory action and when assurance was given by the United States and Great Britain that no cut in the price of gold is contemplated. A reduction in the price of gold is regarded as undesirable from the German viewpoint, although such a step would facilitate the Reichsbank's efforts to replenish its gold resources. It is felt that a decline in the price of gold and the corresponding increase in the gold content of foreign currencies would tend to have a deflationary effect on commodity prices, which, in turn, would retard the flow of German exports.

Industrial operations in the Reich have been active, with the exception of the building industry, which is suffering a temporary setback because of a shortage of steel. The engineering industry was operating at 94 per cent of capacity in May, and the orders on the books of the leading branches exceed the capacity of the plants. Exports of machines during the first four months of this years were 31 per cent in value above those in the corresponding period last year.

The latest unemployment figures reflect the expanded production schedules. During last month the number of unemployed declined by 189,000, bringing the total down to 776,000, as against 1,491,000 in the corresponding month last year. A considerable part of the rise in industrial activity, however, is attributed to Government orders. In fact, the Trade Research Institute has declared that orders placed under the armament and the four-year plans alone have had the effect of increasing operations of the important industries by about 20 per cent above last year's levels.

Ise—Nippon's Soul

We went again to the inn on Tiger Tail Hill, but this time the inn was filled to overflowing, as was the whole town of Ise. The Premier of the Empire and other high officials were staying at our inn, which meant that detectives lurked in every corner. We three foreigners were watched especially closely until, on the morning of the ceremony, when we could not get a taxi, the Premier kindly lent us his own official automobile until noon. After that the detectives scarcely glanced at us, believing that we must be all right.

The ceremony itself took place after the sun had gone down and while a gentle autumn rain was falling. Dressed in frock coats and top hats, we took our places beneath the great semisheltering cryptomeria in the shrine park. To the wailing of reed flutes and in the glare of pine torches, the procession moved from out the old shrine, turned along the gravel path and slowly entered the new shrine, there to deposit the Sacred Mirror on its altar for another two decades.

The Princes and the Government official wore gold-braided Court dress. They were followed by priests and musicians in ancient Japanese costume, by sword-bearers and by archers. Four long walls of wavering white silk, carried by men hidden within them and so invisible, passed from the old shrine to the new, and behind those delicate curtain walls was borne the box of white hinoki wood in which reposed the Sacred Mirror that no mortal eye has seen these many centuries.

The Mirror was concealed, but the soul of a nation, of a people, was laid bare. It was impossible to witness this most sacred ceremony in this most sacred spot in all Japan and remain unmoved. It was impossible to be present at the Shikinen Sengusai and fail to gain a fuller, a more rounded, a deeper appreciation of a great people that, whatever their faults may be, offers the world the greatest example of enduring and changeless loyalty that it knows.

England Defeats Scotch Golfers In Annual Tilts

Observer

CARNOUSTIE, July 4—England defeated Scotland by two points in the annual international match which preceded the Open championship here today. England did not win a single foursome, but the team completely dominated Scotland in the singles, winning nine of the twelve matches and losing the remaining three.

Two of the seven Ryder Cup players were beaten, Padgham by Adams and Burton by Fallon.

Since the inaugural contest in 1903, Scotland has not won a match, and this was the closest game since 1912, when honors were divided.

Dismal weather conditions affected the size of the crowds, though 3,000 people, wearing all manner of waterproof clothing, watched the various matches. The result of the foursomes was all the more surprising because England's team included seven Ryder Cup players, some of whom were partners in the recent match. They performed no better than at Southport. Hastings and Fallon, Scotland's leading pair, gave the side a good start by beating Padgham and Lacey by one hole. Out in 38 and 3 up, the Scottish pair seemed to have the match well in hand, but, fighting back, England squared at the 16th, a one-shot hole of 235 yards where Padgham pitched dead from a bunker at the corner of the green. But Scotland took the lead again at the 17th, where Padgham cut his drive into rough grass, knee deep. The 18th was halved in 4.

Recovery Play By Alliss

Scotland also won the second match, Knight and Ayton, jun., a young player of great promise, beating Alliss and R. Burton 3 and 2. As in the Ryder Cup match, Alliss was constantly rescuing the side from impossible places. This kind of thing could not go on for ever, the end coming at the 16th, where Burton completely mishit his tee shot.

In the singles there was a Scottish landslide, though Adams for the third successive year, beat Padgham in the leading match 1 up. It was a great struggle, Adams being round in 71, and Padgham, who showed greatly improved form, being one stroke worse. The feature of the match was the inordinate number of stymies, Padgham having no fewer than four laid against him.

Hooking his drive at the seventh against the boundary fence, Padgham had to stand out of bounds and on the wires in order to play the shot. He made a fine recovery, but was robbed of a half by a stymie. Stymies also robbed him of the next two holes. Padgham squared the match at the eleventh, but, missing short putts at the next two holes, lost both. He won the fourteenth, but was still 1 down going to the last hole. Here Adams recovered brilliantly from a bunker and holed a good putt for a 4 and won the match.

Fallon was one of the three Scotsmen to win, beating Burton 4 and 3. Out in 33, he was 5 up, having had five simple putts.

FOURSOMES

W. M. Hastings (Balassie) and J. Fallon (Huddersfield) beat A. H. Padgham (Sundridge Pw.) and A. J. Lacey (Berkshire), 1 up; G. Knight (Bloxwich) and L. B. Ayton, Jun. (S. Shields) beat R. Burton (Hooton) and P. Alliss (Temple Newsam), 3 and 2; J. Adams (R. Liverpool) and D. McCulloch (Troon) beat W. J. Cox (Wimbledon Pk.) and J. J. Busson (Pannal), 4 and 3; T. Dobson (E. Renfrewshire) and G. Duncan (Mere) and C. A. Whitcombe (Crews Hill) and R. A. Whitcombe (Parkstone), halved; W. Anderson (Murcar) and G. Hutton (Leven) beat S. L. King (Knole Pk.) and T. Collinge (Swinton Pk.) 2 up; J. P. Durward (Banchory) and W. Davis (Dumfries) and J. J. Taylor (Potters Bar) and W. G. Oke (Fulwell), halved.

SINGLE

Adams lost to Padgham, 1 up; Ayton lost to Lacey, 3 and 2; Fallon beat Burton, 4 and 3; Lacey, 3 and 2; Fallon beat Burton, 4 and 3; Hastings lost to Alliss, 5 and 4; Davies lost to W. C. A. Whitcombe, 5 and 3; Dobson lost to R. A. Whitcombe, 5 and 3.

McCulloch lost to Busson, 3 and 1; Duncan lost to King, 4 and 3; Durward lost to Taylor, 4 and 2; Knight beat Oke, 4 and 3; Anderson lost to Cox, 6 and 5.

Columbia To Make 62 Feature Films

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, July 1—Columbia Pictures will release sixty-two feature productions, 126 short subjects and four serials on its 1937-38 program, it was announced yesterday. One of the company's more ambitious ventures of the season will be its picturization of the current George S. Kaufman-Moss Hart play, "You Can't Take It With You," which was purchased last Winter for $200,000.

Of the sixty-two films announced, forty will feature well-known stars and featured players, twenty-two will be outdoor dramas comprising six Buck Jones Special Westerns, eight starring Charles Starret, and eight "All-Story All-Star Westerns." In addition to the new season's product, Columbia will release generally in September the Frank Capra production, "Lost Horizon," which heretofore was exhibited exclusively at road show theaters. Mr. Capra will be represented on the new program, although the pictures he will make have not been announced.

Some of the Major Plays

Among the properties scheduled are: "The Awful Truth," co-starring Irene Dunne and Cary Grant; "I'll Take Romance," with Grace Moore and Melvyn Douglas; "Paris on Broadway," a musical to be written and produced by Oscar Hammerstein 2d; "Penitentiary," a Courtney Riley Cooner expose of prison life; "It's All Yours," introducing Madeleine Carroll and Francis Leder as a romantic team; two untitled Joe E. Brown comedies, one untitled Edward G. Robinson picture, and a Francis Marion production, untitled, which is described as "a spectacular drama of America's heroic past," written by Courtney Riley Cooper and Frank R. Adams.

Also "Grand Gesture," tentative title for a musical from Alex Rackowe's story of night club life; "Nobel," based on the life and adventures of Alfred Bernhard Nobel, donor of the prize that bears his name; "The Second Mrs. Draper," with Gloria Swanson; "Miss Quis," from the recent play by Ward Morehouse and Peggy Wood; "It Happened in Hollywood," starring Richard Dix with Fay Wray; "For Tonight Only," a comedy about the professional escort; "Absent Without Leave," a marital comedy by Stefan Bekeffi; "I Married an Artist," by B. Avery Strakosh; "Life Begins With Love," with Jean Parker and Douglass Montgomery; "Streamlined," "Cape of Good Hope," from the play by Ladislaus Bus-Fekete; "The Night Before," by Paul Gallico; "College Hero," by Corey Ford, and "There's Always a Woman," from the mystery story by Wilson Collison.

Many Players Listed

Players, other than those previously mentioned, who will appear in some of these films are Jean Arthur, Don Ameche (on a loan arrangement from Twentieth Century-Fox), Dolly Haas, Walter Connolly, Dolores Del Rio, Luli Deste, Frances Drake, Ralph Bellamy, Mary Astor, Lionel Stander, Marguerite Churchill, Jack Holt, Lena Mariele, Wyn Cahoon, Chester Morris, Richard Arlen, Mischa Auer, Grace Bradley, Rosalind Keith, Thurston Hall, Reginald Denny, Esther Ralston and Walter Catlett.

Writers and directors under contract to Columbia include Robert Riskin, Frances Marion, Oscar Hammerstein 2d, Samson Raphaelson, Stephen Morehouse Avery, David L. Loew, Leo McCarey, Edward H. Griffith, Marion Gering, Dwight Taylor and Vina Delmar.

In the serial field Columbia will make "Jungle Menace," starring Frank Buck; "The Adventures of the Mysterious Pilot," with Captain Frank Hawks; "The Secret of Treasure Island" and "The Great Adventures of Wild Bill Hickok."

Sh-h!

A gentleman was walking down the street with his little boy at his side when the youngster cried out, "Oh, Pa! There goes an editor."

"Hush, hush," said the father. "Don't make sport of the poor man. Goodness knows what you may come to yourself some day."

No Easy Job For Caption Writers Of Foreign Films

By CHARLES JAHRBLUM

N. Y. Times

Probably the casual moviegoer never gives a thought to the trials and tribulations of the caption writer of foreign films. Why should he? The slightly belligerent aim of the following paragraphs is to give the layman, whether he cares or not, some explanatory notes about the tasks of this little heard of back-screen personage, whose journeyman business it is to convey to those moviegoers not conversant with the language of the picture the main threads of the story, by superimposing captions on the film.

However, the work involved is not merely translation of dialogue; the duty of the title writer is also to interpret and condense. Then, too, the English subtitles must be composed and inserted in such fashion as not to overcrowd the picture. A knotty problem indeed is how many subtitles to include. Even though a full translation is impossible and also undesirable, nevertheless too few titles make the man in the theater fear he is missing out on some of the humor or sidelights.

The quantity of captions will, of course, vary according to the degree of action in the picture. Thus, if interest lies mainly, say, in the physical exploits of the hero, or scenic background, the subtitler's task is rather easy. On the other hand, if the drama is a conversation piece, as is often the case in stage plays adapted to the screen, the caption writer has his job cut out. He must try to capture in his subtitles all the presumptive sparkle and pungency of the original dialogue. Statistical examples: The Slovak super-action talkie, "Janosik," has only 220 titles, while "Dr. Knock," the French satire about the medical profession, has nearly 700. The French "Escale" (retitled "Under His Spell") has three great assets of the screen, dialogue, action and scenery; it has 400 subtitles, a happy average.

Whatever the number of titles, the result should be to stimulate in the patron the same reactions he would experience if he understood the original dialogue. Obviously, it would be impossible to superimpose titles to cover everything said in the film. If everything were translated, the reading matter would obliterate the picture and the eyestrain caused by the speed at which captions would have to succeed each other would be so great that people would flee to the exits with headaches and smarting eyes. If, however, after all possible elimination, the number of titles is still too high, and yet their presence seems necessary to insure continuity, use is made of "dissolvers," or titles which are faded in.

Thus, in order not to become too much of a good thing, captions must necessarily be concentrated. They should be packed with the ideas the dialogue-writer has tried to put over. The subtitler, in other words, has the same task as the dialogue-writer, but is restricted to a minimum of words, I say ideas because those title-writers who are content with translating mere words will soon find themselves on the wrong track, whereas the transiator who concentrates mainly upon ideas will always be nearer the truth even if he does not use the exact words or expressions employed in the original script.

This, I believe, is excellently illustrated in "Dr. Knock." Following is the literal translation of a few lines taken from that picture: "* * * And then, he would always prescribe 5 centimes' worth of medicine. Sometimes just a tisane. You can readily understand that people paying eight francs for a consultation don't want to be prescribed 5 centimes' worth of medicine." ("Tisane" is a cheap decoction of herbs widely used throughout France.) The spirit of this remark was caught in the following subtitle: "He'd always prescribe hot lemonade. Anybody paying as much as eight francs for a consultation doesn't like to get plain lemonade for a prescription."

A title must be concise, indeed, not to "stay on" longer than the speech it purports to interpret, and some lines are spoken so quickly that the subtitler has only the merest flash at his disposal. The process of fixing the exact length and position of the subtitle in the picture is called "spotting." It is done on the "Moviola," a miniature combination motion-picture projector and screen. The film can be played back and forth on this instrument and stopped at any convenient moment.

When the subtitler has completed his list of titles it is taken to the printer, who after carefully centering each title prints it in white letters at the bottom of a black pasteboard card about 9 x 7 inches in size. After meticulous checking and counter-checking these cards are sent to the laboratory, where they are photographed in the indicated footage. The negative film thus obtained is superimposed on the negative of the picture and so the required positive print, with superimposed titles, is finally produced.

Cubs Triumph, 9-4 Keep First Place

N. Y. Times

ST. LOUIS, June 30—In another long game with plenty of hits and many pitchers, the Chicago Cubs defeated the St. Louis Cardinals again today, 9 to 4, to retain first place in the National League against a New York Giant threat.

The Cubs smashed out twenty lusty hits, including home runs by Gabby Hartnett and Augie Galan, off Lon Warneke, Mike Ryba and Si Johnson. Against three of Charlie Grimm's moundsmen, the Red Birds made eleven hits, but the fourth, Charlie Root, handcuffed them in the last 2 2-3 innings to get credit for the victory.

The battle, lasting 2 hours and 47 minutes, resembled yesterday's wild and wooly game, in which the Cubs used six pitchers against the Cards' four in winning, 11 to 9.

Hartnett and Galan hit their circuit clouts in the sixth, the Cubs' big inning, and there were three other hits and a wild pitch for a total of four runs.

The Cardinals made poor use of their eleven hits and the six walks issued by the Chicago pitchers.

LOTUS FLOWER FOUND TO POP

The lotus flower comes into bloom with a pop but the sound is so minute that it must be amplified 300 times to be audible to the human ear, was the verdict reached by Dr. Ichiro Oga, botanist, who with other curious people went to the Shinobazu Pond in Uyeno early Saturday morning to test the truth of the old saying that the flower blooms with an explosive sound.

BUS MEETS BEAR

A fully-packed motorbus encountered last Thursday evening along the Adzusa river in Kamikochi in the Japan Alps on its way to Shimajima a big bear. The beast was about to attack the car but was scared away when the passengers shouted in unison with the driver hooting the horn and turning on the head lights suddenly.

WOMEN FIRE BRIGADE

There is a fire brigade composed entirely of women at Kohato, Nishi Tagawa district, Yamagata prefecture, a fishing village facing the Japan Sea, because menfolk are absent fishing in the northern seas except in winter. The brigade was instituted about 20 years ago and its members' ages range from 18 to 30.

STUDENTS CONQUER DIFFICULT PEAK

Peak No. 4 of Mt. Matashiro (about 10,000 meters above sea-level) in the North Japan Alps was conquered last Sunday morning by four members of the Mountaineering Club of Aoyama Gakuin headed by Mr. Nobuyoshi Sejyogi, who succeeded in scaling its 500 meter high wall which had hitherto defeated all efforts to surmount it.

US And Canada Affirm Friendship On Dominion Day

OTTAWA,—Declaring that American-Canadian friendship "is secure from every hazard of destruction or misunderstanding," and that the two countries are "marching in the same direction, toward the same goal," President Roosevelt and Governor-General Tweedsmuir exchanged greetings on the occasion of Canada's 70th anniversary of confederation. Both spoke over the radio, the President from his home in Hyde Park, Lord Tweedsmuir from the British cruiser York in Quebec harbor.

President Roosevelt's Message

President Roosevelt said:

"On behalf of the government and people of the United States, it gives me sincere gratification to extend a word of greeting to our Canadian friends and to congratulate them on the seventieth anniversary of Canadian confederation.

"Through the years that have elapsed since that memorable July 1st, 1867, we of the United States have watched with the keenest and most sympathetic interest the splendid progress of the Canadian nation which, in ever increasing measure, commands our respect and inspires our affection.

"Indvidually, and collectively, we pledge you the continuation of our warm friendship. I do not know of any greater gift in the power of nations or of individuals to bestow.

"On this occasion the Canadian people will pause to contemplate the changes—spiritual and cultural as well as material—of the past 70 years. The field is broad, but in whatever direction you may look you will find just cause for pride. We rejoice with you in your past and your present and in the promise which the future holds.

"Ours is an enviable record of friendship and amity, as witness an unfortified boundary of more than 5000 miles as the outward and visible token of mutual confidence and good will.

"This friendship between our two peoples is secure from every hazard of destruction or misunderstanding because it is based upon a common aspiration to maintain, to defend, and to perpetuate the democratic form of constitutional, representative government.

"In that spirit I salute our neighbor of the north. I congratulate the Canadian people on the successful achievements of free institutions through three score and ten years of confederation. And as one who has spent so many happy moments on Canadian soil, I send you my affectionate greetings."

Lord Tweedsmuir's Message

The text of Lord Tweedsmuir's answer to the President's message follows:

"On behalf of the people of Canada I most warmly reciprocate the greeting of the President of the United States. Canada is an old country; as a territorial unit she is older than the United States, older even than New England or Virginia. But the United States became a federated people nearly a century before us, and thereby set us an example.

"We welcome with gratitude and affection the good wishes of the President not merely as a pledge of fellowship between neighbors and old friends but as the congratulations of the pioneers who blazed the trial for us follow.

"We are neighbors and friends and we are also colleagues. We are both North American peoples with the making of a new civilization in our hands. We have both behind us a living European tradition which must be the basis of that civilization. And we are both coming to realize that we have certain responsibilities to the world at large, which may still be difficult to define, but which it is probable will have much in common. Marching in the same direction toward the same goal, I hope and believe that more and more we shall come to pool our ideas about the problems of the road.

"I should like to offer to the people of Canada one reflection which I think is appropriate to this day of national remembrance. Seventy years ago the Fathers of Confederation accomplished a great work.

"They gave Canada union. They could not give her unity. Unity comes only by the process of time, by the slow assimilation of different points of view and different traditions. Canada must have not merely a formal confederation, but a sincere identity of purpose, and a true homogeneity of spirit. Let us remember today that her destiny is not to be mere territorial expression and not to be merely nine provinces, but to be a single and indivisible nation."

nobody will notice it.

"If the lady's face is too thin and long, she must cover all the hollow places with very light rouge and powder. Why? Because this will induce reflection on those places and they will cease to appear hollow.

"Ladies with large ears need only to cover those ears with a dark foundation and dark powder, shutting off possibility of reflection calling attention to the ears.

"For dark circles under the eyes, try this: After putting on the foundation cream paint a streak of white talcum powder over the circles. Then cover the entire face with dark powder. The talcum can be painted on below the eyes, in a narrow streak, with a small brush. This highlights the circles, and their coloring blends with the rest of the face.

"If a lady wishes to appear voluptuous—and what lady doesn't—let her use a dark red for her lips, then put vaseline on them, and darken her eyes. If she would be spiritual, she needs only to use light brown instead of black around her eyes, and orange instead of red on her lips, with no vaseline added.

"For a beauty in any face, avoid straight lines. Everything beautiful is curved, so curve the lips and eyebrows."

A bit of "lowdown" is offered by Stephanoff in the statement that there are "less than five feminine screen stars who don't need some correction for facial blemishes" before going to work on a set. Such blemishes include flat noses which must be given ridges, crooked noses which must be straightened by highlights and shadows, small eyes which must be made to appear larger by pencil work and artificial eyelashes.

"So there will always be some work for the make-up artist," decides Stephanoff, "as long as so few women are perfect facially, even though they need no actual make-up."

The King Of Gamblers

the role of a reporter who falls in love with a racketeer's girl friend, played by Claire Trevor, and the two lead to the undoing of the underworld czar.

Another reformed villain is Porter Hall. Hall came to films in "The Thin Man" and achieved his greatest popularity since in "The General Died at Dawn" and "The Plainsman."

In "King of Gamblers," however, Hall is a thoroughly likeable if somewhat fussy managing editor of a reform newspaper.

The third is Harvey Stephens. This notable actor got his first "break" away from villainy as the village doctor in "Maid of Salem" but he went right back to villainy in "Murder Goes to College" and has stayed there until he was cast in "King of Gamblers." In this story he portrays a Wall Street man who falls under the control of Akim Tamiroff, who plays the title role.

The man of the kimonas and junics is Akim Tamiroff, best known for his portrayal of General Yang in "The General Died at Dawn." Tamiroff wore "civvies" for the first time in "Her Husband Lies." It was the manner in which he handled that assignment and his ability to wear the flashy attire of Broadway's sporting and gambling fraternity which won him the title role in "King of Gamblers."

The singing star who never sang before is Miss Trevor who, as a night club entertainer, sings two new hit tunes, "Hate to Talk About Myself," a new Robin and Rainger opus, and "I'm Feelin' High," a new tune by Burton Lane and Ralph Freed. Miss Trevor plays the feminine romantic lead in "King of Gamblers."

The newcomer who proves herself an actress of great versatility is Helen Burgess. Miss Burgess is the girl who was given an important role by Cecil B. DeMille in "The Plainsman" despite the fact that she had never been in pictures before, and who scored opposite John Trent in "A Doctor's Diary."

"King of Gamblers" is an original story by Tiffany Thayer, noted author of sensational stories. Its elaborate cast also includes Larry Crabbe, Barlowe Borland, Evelyn Brent and many others.

Soup made without meat /-better!
No longer is it necessary to prepare soup stock and keep it on hand. Use Aji-no-moto, a convenient white powder made of wheat (no meat in it) which smells like cream cheese but, when dissolved, has the fine flavor and nourishing qualities of good beef.
Chemically pure, like sugar or salt, Aji-no-moto keeps perfectly in any climate. Assimilated almost instantly, it is kind to cranky digestions.

In response to a complaint that they scatter sand, residents have been asked to keep their dogs off of the beach during the bathing hours.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The Happy Hawaiians, the popular Hawaiian Novelty Trio will be featured at the dinner dance to be given Saturday at the Karuizawa New Grand Lodge. This trio won great applause when they appeared at every Takarazuka Chain Theater accompanying the Hawaiian Hula dancers who were in Japan not long ago.

The Kawashima Novelty Jazz Orchestra which was so successful last Saturday will appear again this Saturday. Dinner will be served at 6:30 p.m. and will be followed by the dance at 9 p.m.

The draw for the Annual Blowout Chess Tournament took place on Monday, July 26th, and the results were posted on the Notice Board.

In the first round, Gatenby will play Kunze, the winner meeting Pletner in the second round. The other games to be played off during the second round are Martin vs. Hutchinson, Kirby vs. Robert, and Mrs. Christopher vs. Hager.

A number of strong players, including Dr. Mitamura and Mrs. Janouski, who usually take part in the tournament, and are close runner-ups for the title, are absent from Karuizawa this summer, while others are unable to find time to participate in this tournament. Mr. Kunze, from the Nagoya Higher Commercial School, who has entered for the first time this year, is reported to be a strong contender for the championship this year.

Names Selected

about the much-mooted question of main battery guns, and although the two new English battleships, King George V and Prince of Wales, which were laid down Jan. 1, are to mount 14-inch guns, it is highly probable the North Carolina and her consort will mount nine 16-inch guns in three turrets. They also will carry a formidable secondary battery, and probably eight or ten heavy anti-aircraft guns of the four-or five-inch type, together with numerous machine guns and the multiple-barreled 1.1 inch "pom-poms."

Planes in Equipment

They will be more adequately armored with better watertight subdivision and compartmentation than any of our preceding ships. They are expected to carry some four to eight light observation planes and dive bombers.

With new type high pressure boilers and geared turbines arranged in a new way, it has been estimated that as much as 400 tons in weight can be saved in the construction of the ships—a saving which will go almost entirely into armor and better protection. Welding is expected to be used extensively in construction.

The North Carolina will be the fourth vessel so called. Her immediate predecessor of post-war days was never commissioned. The first vessel so named was a ship of the line of 2,633 tons, carrying seventy-four guns. She was launched at Philadelphia in 1820, cruised as flagship of the Mediterranean Squadron from 1825 to 1827, was receiving ship at the Brooklyn Navy Yard from 1839 to 1866 and was sold in 1867. The second North Carolina was an armored cruiser of 14,500 tons, commissioned in 1908. Her name was later changed to Charlotte, and she was sold in 1930.

There have been five Washingtons on the navy list prior to the ship that is still unborn. The last one—an incompleted hulk—was sunk by underwater explosions and by the guns of the battleship Texas in the experiment off the Virginia Capes in 1924. The first Washington was an 8-gun galley, which was captured, after severe losses, by the British in an action on Lake Champlain in 1776.

The second also had bad luck, being burned by the British in the Delaware River in 1778, even before she had received her armament. The third Washington, a ship of 2,250 tons, launched in 1814, cruised in the Mediterranean and elsewhere, and was finally broken up at New York in 1843. The fourth Washington was a 14,500-ton armored cruiser, commissioned in 1906. Her name was changed to the Seattle in 1916. She was flagship of the cruiser and transport force during the World War and later of the United States fleet, and now a mute, inglorious shadow of her former self. Moored forever to a dock, she acts as the receiving ship at the navy yard in Brooklyn.

The assignment of the construction of the North Carolina to the New York yard is not expected to make any appreciable difference in the work load there, which now stands at about 7,000 men, exclusive of WPA employes. This is not the greatest number of men employed in the yard within the last five years, but is not too far from the peak. It will be from two to three years, probably, before employment resulting from construction work on the North Carolina will reach its peak, and even then the new battleship will not be the bonanza to Brooklyn that many had thought.

Most of the fabricated material for the ship will be manufactured elsewhere, and thousands of workmen far from the Atlantic sea-board will benefit, as well as the comparative handful in Brooklyn who will do the actual assembly and construction of the ship.

The North Carolina is expected to be laid down on the ways to be vacated by the 10,000-ton cruiser Helena or by the 10,000-ton cruiser Honolulu, two of the three ships now building at the yard. The Helena was laid down late last year and is somewhat different from the Brooklyn, now nearing completion and the Honolulu, which is still on the ways.

Britain Moves

women) is, at times, ready to listen to any siren voices that can persuade him or her that Britain is "not a part of Europe," that it is open to a British government to imitate America or Canada—turn away from the Continent and join an immune and happy group of English-speaking peoples.

Nothing to Lose or Gain

As fearful as any Middle Western Senator of foreign guile and entanglements, this numerous group of voters, and the writers and politicians who cater to their illusions, believe that Britain will be betrayed by any Continental allies that she may have, that she has nothing to lose or gain in Europe, and that, by refusing to touch the accursed thing, she can remain clean and safe. This spirit lay behind the general indifference to the German breach of Locarno by the occupation of the Rhineland. Arguments based on the necessity of honoring the national signature meant nothing to this class of persons and that any such question should have been raised added to the irritation felt against the French.

Anti-French feeling is undoubtedly strong in this group, but its base is less dislike of the French for being where they are. If they were not so near, if there were not awkward traditions and engagements to defend French territory, it would be possible, so it is felt to keep out of Continental wars altogether. And if the French would only behave themselves (that is, think first of British interests instead of their own selfish designs), the regrettable fact that the Channel is only twenty miles across and not getting any wider could be tolerated. But the French, with their alliances and doctrines of "an indivisible peace," are involving themselves in a net from which war is the only issue. Why should not Britain invoke a plague on both your houses and leave France and Germany and Russia and Italy to their doom?

"Why not?" is the answer of multitudes and of individuals of some importance. Let Germany make war on Russia, swallow Czechoslovakia; what business is it of Britain's? If the war can be kept east of the Rhine, why worry? This indifference to the balance of power and to the effect on Britain's imperial position after a war in which, whether a participant or not, Japan must be a winner or loser, illustrates the bewilderment of the public mind. For the preachers of this view are not, in the main, the old-fashioned radical pacifists but self-styled imperial realists. No one has opened Lord Palmerston's grave, but he must have been tossing badly during the last few years!

This policy, though widely accepted and preached in high places, has little chance of adoption. The rulers of Britain are practical men, and they know that isolation was never less feasible than now—unless the price is paid; and that price is a surrender of the imperial position of Britain. No more than in 1914, can Britain let France be destroyed, and so Britain is tied to French policy: she can warn, she can attempt to bully, but in the long run, for geographical and military, as well as for economic and imperial reasons, Britain and France, the two western empires that hold so much that other people want, have to stick together. That sticking together may be disguised under phrases like "our common democratic ideals" but the basis of this unwilling union is factual, not ideal. If there is a war, Britain will be in it and on the French side. Editors may pontificate and German diplomats give parties, but the decision is inevitable.

Limited-Liability Wars

There remains, however, a realist group which admits these facts but which hopes to return to the "old British way" of waging war. Mackenzie King recently expressed his belief that not only would Canada never send an army overseas again but that Britain would not. Memories of a dreadful military effort have led many persons (for example, the most influential British military critic, Liddell Hart) to argue that Britain should decide for herself in the next war what share she will take. She is not, it is argued, to be tied to French military methods, not to send millions of men to France; she is to go back to the good old days of limited-liability wars, to the age of Jane Austen. This is a subtler type of wishful thinking—but it is wishful thinking all the same.

Britain is menaced not with inconvenience but with death if the Channel ports fall into hostile hands and she will have to fight as hard as she knows how. In the good old days a British general like Wellington maneuvering in a foreign country could display admirable fortitude when it came to sacrificing his ally's territory. He could always sail home if need be and in general act like the Irish landlord who wrote from London that if his tenants thought they could intimidate him by shooting his bailiff they were much mistaken.

But, as Mr. Baldwin has pointed out, Britain's frontier is now on the Rhine; and, as Lord Haig said in 1918, the British Army (just like those of the Continent) may find itself with its back to the wall. This, too, the government, it may be suspected, realizes, and this unpleasant truth the nation suspects. The days of limited-liability wars, like the days of British immunity from complete defeat, are over.

No one can doubt that the British people, the most patriotic in the world, will readjust itself to its worsened position. But the readjustment will take time. And, while it is going on, politicians will play safe and show no morbid fear of backing down. It is not a dignified policy but it has much to recommend it, for a country whose rulers remember that the real lesson of the late war was that the internal unity of a nation was a surer guarantee of victory than a first-class military machine. That unity does not exist at the moment in Britain and its creation is as anxiously awaited by the British Government as is the completion of any number of warships.

British foreign policy is bound to be that of a formerly very rich man slowly learning to live within comparatively straitened means. Such a man will get used to it in time, but at the beginning he is liable to excessive penury. In British foreign policy that penury is reflected in a willingness to swallow affronts—an attitude that can be made to seem ridiculous but may be, for the moment, wise. At any rate the British elector is unwilling to take any risks that can be avoided and the politician (even when he doubts the wisdom of this course) will obey orders, hoping that time will restore to Britain some of that self-confidence that she owned yesterday—as no doubt time will.

Streamline Trains

against the air is comparatively negligible. In fact, at 60 miles an hour the old blunt-ended locomotive has been found to waste at least a quarter of its power in merely pushing the air aside.

These tests have governed the type of streamlining adopted on British railways. It is hardly as brilliant a type as the Germans have adopted on their Flying Hamburger, which maintains an average speed of seventy-seven miles an hour on its Berlin-Hamburg run and is probably the fastest train in Europe. But the Fying Hamburger is driven by heavy-oil Diesel engines, and probably it is easier to devise new types of streamlining when you begin by scrapping steam and all the tradition of steam.

The Flying Hamburger has a rounded nose, its wheels and coach-joints are sheathed in flowing aluminum shields, and all its handles, ventilators and lamps are tucked away out of the wind-stream so they slip through the air without offering any points of resistance.

Limited in Capacity

Complete streamlined trains have been built for the new high-speed service to Scotland and Leeds. Like the Silver Jubilee Express to Newcastle, all the new trains have been limited in capacity to keep down their weight, but they will all be a bit heavier than the Newcastle train. The Silver Jubilee consists of seven coaches, while the new expresses consist of eight or nine. A good deal of track adjustment has beeen involved, for the new streamlined Pacific locomotives are heavier than the ordinary Pacifics.

One company alone is building a fleet of thirty-one new streamlined Pacific modeled on the Silver Jubilee. Altogether, the British railways have finally abandoned the easy-going policy which enabled the highway services to capture much of their traffic a few years ago.

Airplanes Gain Longer Range

By LEO A. KIERAN

N. Y. Times

The ever-widening network of international airlines, bringing with it the further need for long flights, non-stop over both land and water, has turned the attention of aircraft designers to the development of long range types.

The 5,288-mile flight of the Soviet pilots Chkaloff, Baidukoff and Beliakoff, from Moscow to the State line of Oregon, clearly indicates the value of airplanes capable of long range. Had their ship not been of that type the flight could never have been attempted, for they had to pass over thousands of miles of uncharted and undeveloped territory where a forced landing would spell disaster.

The full value of their flight, however, will be known only when it is determined how much of the data collected can be adapted to military and commercial aviation. Like the development of a safety factor, such spectacular flights serve as laboratory experiments. It must follow that a plane which can carry sufficient fuel for 5,000 miles can be made to operate on a basis of airline economics or at least half that distance, regardless of terrain. Elimination of half the total distance brings with it a reduction of more than half the fuel needed, as the plane uses more fuel during the first half of a long journey than during the second, due to load reduction.

Bomber Radius Grows

In all air-active countries the trend is toward longer flying range development. England, France and Germany are developing aircraft to be capable of flying across the North Atlantic on commercial routes. The military services of all the air powers likewise are concentrating on bombers of longer flight radius. Military planes use the term radius in place of range because on average missions the bombers to commercial design is still in the early stages.

In Europe the building and placing in service of the heavy bomber is indicative of the trend. Russia, with its new 280-mile an hour TB-6, can carry a 2-ton bomb load 2,000 miles non-stop. Italy has ordered squadrons of F. I. A. T. BR-20s, whose performance figures are said to be 260 miles an hour, a ton and a half bomb load and a range of 1,500 miles. A Savoia-Marchetti heavy bomber known as the S-79 is still shrouded in secrecy as regards performance data.

England, whose policy of keeping in the van in military aviation is being put to the test, is still using bombers with 2,000 miles of range and is sacrificing some range in the interest of greater speed. France, with its Bloch 131 dual-motored ship, carries 2,204 pounds of bombs for about 2,400 miles.

Civil Aircraft Abroad

In the building of long range European aircraft for commercial use Germany claims the lead because of the development of the Jumo 205 Diesel motor, cutting down fuel consumption and unit power plant weight. The German practice of catapulting the heavily laden planes also adds to the range.

France is building its plane to bid for transatlantic work in the form of a Bloch flying boat with four engines. The motors to be used in the plane have not been announced. France, too, has been concentrating on Diesel development with some measure of success. Present estimated figures for the boat indicate twelve tons of useful load over a range of 3,500 miles at a speed of 190 miles an hour. The plane is being designed to carry twenty passengers in its cabin. It has a span of 98 feet and an overall length of 98 feet.

Probably the greatest single improvement making possible the range increases of modern aircraft has been the wide adoption of the constant-speed propeller. By its use maximum power can be obtained at takeoff and fuel consumption lowered while cruising, thus reducing the required fuel load and increasing pay load.

Heavy Wing Loading Helps

Second only to the constant-speed propellers comes the general practice of using high wing loading, a design feature which was impossible before the development of the new airscrew. The high wing load makes for greater speed, once aloft, and the use of flaps and other forms of airbrake or high lift device allows for greater useful load carrying.

A third factor of importance, and one which limits the ultimate size of such aircraft, is the increase in horsepower in the individual power plant. Coupled with the improved propellers, the efficient wing and carefully streamlined aircraft itself engines can now be cruised at points as low as 40 per cent of their highest power, a practice which reduces by more than 60 per cent the maximum fuel consumption per mile with a loss of a much smaller fraction of the maximum speed.

Thus, mile per gallon, capacity per horsepower and pound per square foot of wing area are constantly being raised; with the net result that the range of any large modern air transport is being lengthened with each new model. Aside from the savings in fuel and other operating costs, the longer ranges open up new vistas for airline development and the operators of both military and commercial aircraft owe much to the body of research engineers and draftsmen for their efforts toward greater efficiency.

Belgium Winner Over Netherlands At Hague Court

Christian Science Monitor

THE HAGUE, June 29.—The World Court has now rejected the Netherlands' contention in a suit against Belgium on the subject of the latter's right to use the water of the Meuse in connection with construction of the Albert Canal.

By 10 votes to 3 the court rejected the Netherlands' complaint that Belgium was acting contrary to the Belgo-Dutch treaty of 1863 and declared that each country has the right to enlarge or alter a canal situated wholly on its own territory, provided the volume of water taken is not affected.

The announcement of the World Court's decision marks another stage in an historic case.

Question at Issue

About one year ago the Netherlands Government instituted proceedings against the Belgian Government. The case related to the question whether the construction by Belgium of various works in connection with the Albert Canal and the manner in which—without the consent of the Netherlands—Belgium at present provides and appears to intend to provide in the future for the supply of water to existing or projected canals in the north of her territory, is consistent with the rights accruing to the Netherlands under the treaty between Netherlands and Belgium of May 12, 1863, concerning the diversion of water from the river Meuse.

The Netherlands claimed the exclusive control of the Meuse because the treaty states that all water for feeding the canals south of Maastricht shall be tapped through a feeding channel on the left bank of the river on Netherlands territory. The Belgians on the other hand contended that the Netherlands violated the treaty by tapping water for the Juliana canal running 22 miles north of Maastricht.

The case took on a quite unusual aspect when in May the Court left its seat for the first time in history and went down to the south of the Netherlands and to Belgium to see for itself what it was all about and how the land lies there. Investigation on the spot is by itself no unusual practice. This sort of thing has been done now and then by international arbitral commissions. But that the complete World Court should make such a trip was quite a different matter.

Unusual Case

Most of the 70 or so previous cases the Court had dealt with since it was founded in 1922 involved mainly theoretical points. They did not face the Court with physical problems. In most of the cases it was a matter of interpretation of texts and treaties. So nothing could be actually added "on the spot." It would, for instance, not have helped the Court very much to see "minority" people in some of the minority cases which came to the Court as an aftermath of the World War and as the effect of the retracing of frontier lines on the map of Europe. Only once before, in 1932, it was suggested that the Court should go down to Switzerland and examine the situation of the free zones of the land of Gex, near Geneva, in the dispute between France and Switzerland, but the plan was dropped.

Moreover, the public has the additional assurance that every means of information has been exhausted.

The Court's visit to the south of Netherlands Limburg and to Belgium laid down a most interesting precedent. For it showed that the Court, if it sees fit to do so, may virtually go to any place on the globe to investigate some situation. And this may go far to satisfy those who cherish the idea of making the Court perambulatory.

The latter would require an amendment of the Statute, which, if it were adopted, could come into force only after a considerable number of years. The Statute of the Court declares that the seat of the Court is The Hague. But this does not mean—as was proved by the Court's excursion the other day—that the court could not meet somewhere else. The Court can always meet at other places than where it has its seat. Now because Limburg and Belgium were so very near, there were no practical obstacles in the way of the Court's going down and seeing for itself.

The whole thing took hardly more than two days. But although, therefore, investigation in a case for instance in South America, is quite possible under the Statute, there may be practical difficulties such as costs and time. For the World Sourt has to pay its own expenses. And it might perhaps be difficult for the instance, three months. But on the other hand, the Court might then send down a delegation from its midst to report on a situation.

was issued for ambulances and he saw none of the many injured persons being lifted on stretchers when they were loaded into the five police wagons for the seven-mile drive to the hospital.

Captain Mooney said that he would not be surprised if the Memorial Day affray had been caused by Communists "financed with Russian gold."

"Here's my definition of a Red," he said. "He's here to undermine the government and to assault policemen."

The witness said that he knew some of the "Reds" had gone to the capital of Russia for "further instructions."

"Where is that?" asked Senator Thomas.

"Where Lenin is," Captain Mooney replied

His recipe for industrial peace, he explained to the committee was to "deport the Reds."

The captain was unable to say whether the gas bombs used by the police were from the city's supply, or from that of the Republic Steel Corporation.

Senator La Follette put into the record a memorandum showing a purchase of $43,901,88 worth of gas and equipment by the Republic Steel Corporation from Federal Laboratories for one month prior to June 1, of which $2,767,42 was allocated to the East Chicago plant.

Chairman La Follette criticized Police Commissioner Allman for not making a more thorough investigation of the May 30 affair, other than to accept the reports made to him by his captains. Then commissioner admitted that he had never known so many fatalities in his thirty-six years of police experience, except in race riots.

When Commissioner Allman insisted the policeman lying on the ground shot strikers in self-defense, Senator La Follette asked how these shots could have lodged in the backs of seven men.

It was a matter of "judgment where the bullets might take effect," he replied. "You cannot do target practice when you are on the ground."

The hearing will be continued. The hitherto suppressed moving-picture film of the battle will be shown during the present investigation.

With and Without

She was one of those women whose chief interest in life is trying to find out all they can about their neighbors. It was a great day for her when a new family moved into the house opposite, and she spent the day watching as the furniture was removed from the van and carried into the house.

"Well," said her husband, who knew her weakness, when he returned from business, "have you managed to find out anything about the social standing of the new folks across the way?"

"Not yet," was the reply. "But they have no car."

"No?"

"And they have no wireless, gramophone, or even a piano. I can't imagine what on earth they have got."

"Perhaps they have a bank account, my dear," said her husband very quietly.

SPECIAL RECITAL OF THE TOKYO ACADEMY OF MUSIC

On the occasion of the opening of the 7th World Federation of Educational Association Congress, a special recital was given by the members of the Tokyo Academy of Music at the Imperial Theater, at 8 p.m. Sunday under the direction of Mr. Kazu Norisugi, director of the academy. In spite of the summer vacation, the instructors and students of the academy gave a number of performances in honor of the foreign delegates to the congress. The program was specially arranged by the instructors of the academy in order to introduce the Japanese music and western orchestral music.

The theater was filled to capacity and the guests included many prominent persons who are attending the congress. The program consisted of the following compositions: "Takasago" Noh play of Professor Kiyohiso Kanze and his company; "Echigo Jishi" Nagauta music and dance by Professor Kintaro Sugimoto, and his orchestra, the dance was performed by Mr. Jusuke Hanayagi and others. "Koto solo with orchestra" a koto concerto composed by Professor Michio Miyagi was performed by the composer himself with the orchestra of the academy. Professor Kunihiko Hashimoto of the academy conducted the orchestra and played the Overture of Leonore No. 3, by Beethoven. The vocal chorus of the academy sang several Japanese local songs and folksongs arranged by Professor Kiyoshi Nobutoki and Nakuzo Shimofusa, which were directed by Professor Tamotsu Kinoshita. The last item of the program was "March and vocal chorus from Tannhauser by Wagner" which was performed by the academy vocal chorus and orchestra under Professor Kinoshita.

NOJIRI NOTES

The week end in Nojiri will inaugurate a series of sport events which is holding the interest of the community on the hill. The golf tournament, a "3-up" affair was was opened on July 29 and should prove popular because it allows for many playing at the same time. The nine hole course on the top of the hill has had some notable improvements. A short teaser at No.4 hole has been set back and the sand "greens" on holes 4, 5 and 7 were enlarged. The committee for golf this year is Mr. J. K. Goldie, Mr. C. K. Parker and Mr. D. C. Stubbs.

Commodore duties of the Nojiri Yacht Club have fallen upon the hands of Mr. V. H. Grant who has called a meeting of the club for Friday July 28. Definite racing plans will be discussed at this meeting. Unless changes are made in the schedule, the races will be held August 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 16, and 18. There are plans of serving tea to spectators attending the races at the new boat-house.

Mr. Darley Downs, in charge of Junior Activities has announced a Junior Swimming Meet to be held on July 30 at 10:00 a.m.

Mr. Joe Miegle, in charge of tennis, announced the opening of the tennis tournament for July 30. Places for mens singles and doubles; ladies singles and doubles and mixed doubles offer all sort of competition. Four Nojiri players have one leg on the Japan Advertiser Cup which they will defend later in Karuizawa.

Mr. W. K. Bunce, chairman of athletics, is arranging base ball games every Friday at 4 p.m. and volleyball on Tuesdays at 4 p.m. which are open to all who wish to indulge in these sports.

Church service this Sunday, August 1st, will be conducted at the Auditorium by the Rev. Darcy Downs. In the afternoon there will be a Japanese Service in charge of the Rev. P. S. C. Powles.

Dr. Ono of St. Lukes who has been the community doctor for this month returns to his post at the hospital on Saturday.

Slay Of 3 Girls

are seated together, and on the side of the Chamber are the members with the government and on the other side the members against the government.

Officials Get the 'Raspberry'

Most of the questions came from the opposition, and to my way of thinking many of them were intended to embarrass the administration. When the department head answered a question, the side with the government said, "Hear, hear!" The other side proceeded to give him what we call in New York the raspberry.

Unlike our American legislative chambers, it is difficult to obtain admission. We had to apply to the Amrican Embassy for tickets, and showed them to no less than six police attendants before we reached the visitors' gallery. It is extremely difficult to hear what is said on the floor of the chamber, as it seems to be without acoustic properties. Five members wore high hats during the session. I was informed that at one time all members wore them. The custom changed, but the five I saw were still wedded to the plug hat. Under the rules a member is required to take his hat off when he rises, speaks, cheers or bows.

The Speaker wears a long white wig that reaches to his shoulders, and the three clerks sitting in front of him wear wigs. I was picturing myself during the hot days of May and June when I was Speaker of the New York Assembly if I had to wear any wig, not to speak of the one I saw on the Speaker of the House of Commons, which must weigh at least three pounds.

War Debt to United States Up

Visitors in the gallery are furnished with printed copies of the questions asked the officials by the members. One of them we were very much interested in. It was addressed by a member named Alexander and was as follows: "To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is correct to infer from command paper 5480 that the arrears of principal and interest now due to the United States in respect of British war debts amounts to approximately £174,000,000; whether it is proposed to continue to allow the arrears to accumulate or whether it is proposed to reopen discussion of the matter with connection with any proposals for a trade agreement."

We all strained our necks to hear the answer, but it seemed to me that everybody started to speak at once and none of us got it. The next day I asked a member of the House what the answer was and he laughed and said he didn't answer it.

On to Whitechapel District

Wednesday morning I went to the London zoo, and was I at home! Don't speak about it! Two thousand five hundred animals, everything from a mouse to an elephant, and not one or two of each kind, but as many as a dozen.

Years ago I read and heard so much about the Whitechapel district that I thought I would like to see it, and I did. It is much like our waterfront on the lower East Side or the middle West Side of Manhattan Island. Of course the houses do not look anything like our tenements. Decidedly fewer families occupy one house. The main street is given over to small shops, meat and vegetable markets, bakeries and the like.

In the course of years London must have grown pretty much the same as New York did. Just as our lower East Side is only a short walk from Wall Street, so also is it a very short distance from Whitechapel to the London Stock Exchange. While New York grew to the north, London grew to the west.

Now that the lake level is regulated, there are no more of the floods which compelled the islanders of Marken to build their houses on stilts and the islanders of Urk to huddle on the high ground at one end of their long island. On the other hand, there are no more droughts. As Dutch polderland is normally as wet as a sponge and has to be pumped to prevent its reverting to marsh, it might be supposed that droughts would be unheard of. A Dutch drought, however, does not necessarily imply an absence of water. It means that the lake levels have fallen a few inches below the canal levels, so that the water cannot be turned into the ditches which feed it to the cattle pools and the grass roots.

In a great cow-milking province like Friesland, which has no rivers and is wholly dependent on its lakes, this difference of a few inches in the water levels can deprive the cattle of their drinking water and even burn up the pastures if it lasts long enough. In such emergencies they used to turn the salt water of the old Zuider Zee into the Friesland canals. Being a mingling of the North Sea and the Rhine, the Zuider Zee was neither as salt as the one nor as fresh as the other; but it was salt enough to poison everything it touched.

And here arises another of the blessings which the sea dike has brought in its train. The Yssel Lake has already turned fresh; not quite as fresh as it will be in years to come, but fresh enough to be safe for cattle and crops. Even after the lake has been reduced to its permanent area of 500 square miles it will continue to form a vast reserve of fresh water regulated to a constant level a few inches higher than that of the Friesland canals. Dutch engineers put the capitalized value of this fresh-water reserve at well over $80,000,000.

Grammar School, attended by the three girls. One of his duties was escorting children across the street.

"I made the girls' acquaintance by helping them across the street. I went about it deliberately for my purposes," Detective Leroy Sanderson quoted him as confessing.

Dyer told officials that day by day he noticed a growing feeling for them that was "more than friendship."

"It was lust alone," he told officers.

"Usually I work in my garden Saturday afternoon," he told police. "But on this Saturday I went to the park to play and talk with them. I stayed until noon. When I left I told the girls to meet me at 3 o'clock at a soft-drink stand near the hills."

The stand was about a mile and a half from Centinela Park, where the girls had gone for a picnic, and met him.

Tells of Brutal Crimes

"The girls met me at the stand. We walked about half a mile into the hills to hunt rabbits. They were talking about hunting rabbits, so I told them we would."

Dyer told officers he led the little girls over the hills and into the ravine to the spot where the body of Madeline was later found.

"I left Jeanette and Melba sitting there," he said. "I took Madeline up the bottom of the canyon to its highest point. I choked her there with my hands. After I choked her I took a piece of rope and tied it around her neck to make sure she was dead."

The rope was a bit of that used by his wife to tie up old newspapers.

Murder Repeated

Then Dyer returned to the two girls and took Jeanette up the canyon, but not to within sight of Madeline's garroted body. He choked her and tied a piece of the rope around her neck.

He then returned to Melba and repeated the procedure.

"Then," he said, "I went back to Madeline—"

Dyer wept as he described the grim walk up the canyon to the body of the youngest child. He told of stopping to ravish her body. He then ravished the others in the order in which he killed.

'Didn't Have a Chance'

Dyer said none of the girls struggled, according to officers. He said Madeline "gave a little scream," but otherwise they made no sound.

"They didn't have a chance," officers quoted him as saying. "They died quickly."

In a fit of remorse, Dyer said he took off the girls' little shoes and sandals and lined them up neatly in rows on the sand.

"Then I prayed over them," police quoted him.

One hour after he had killed the girls, Dyer finally left the body-strewn ravine and hiked over the hill to Inglewood. He said he ate a good supper, changed clothes and went downtown to see if the girls had been missed. Sunday he was a nosey spectator at the search, making himself somewhat of a pest to officers by repeated suggestions. When the bodies were found Monday he rushed to the scene.

Helped Keep Order

"I wore my WPA badge and helped keep order," he said. "I told the men they shouldn't smoke, out of respect to the dead."

Dyer alternated between sobs and fits of weakness in which he nearly swooned. He refused food.

Faints During Examination

"I don't know what made me do it," he moaned when he was asked whether he felt remorse. He threw his arms about a detective for support as he slipped partially from his chair in a paroxysm of weeping.

He fainted while being questioned by alienists and his examination was interrupted half an hour.

Dyer confessed the crime after being questioned in connection with the investigation on two previous occasions.

JAPANESE CONVERSATION GRAMMAR
By Mr. Oreste Vaccari and Mrs. Enko Vaccari

THE LONDON TIMES
LITERARY SUPPLEMENT
No. 1844, Saturday, June 5, 1937

....this new manual is practical and useful, and what Count Kabayama in his prefactory note calls its "human method" will make it acceptable to the growing number of English students of Japanese. When the student has mastered its sixty lessons he will have completed the equivalent of an ordinary Japanese school education and will be at home in the language and able to proceed to higher things.

A feature of the book is its transliteration with Chinese characters of every Japanese example rendered in English spelling so that the student is gradually familiarized with the appearance of the language as well as with its sound.

Studying Japanese with this Grammar Becomes a Real Pleasure

EXTRACTS FROM THE PREFACE

Written by Count Ayské Kabayama, chairman of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai (The Society for International Cultural Relations of Tokyo).

"Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari have brought out what I would like to regard as the most complete book to date for the study of Japanese, and have, thereby, provided an effective and practical guide toward a basic study of the Japanese nation and people ....The method introduced by the authors is not only scientific, but human....the particular of the language, fully treated with practical examples, have been regulated in each lesson according to the measure of a partial effort of the mind....The Japanese taught in the book has struck me as of the best commonly accepted diction today....The authors have introduced a new system of giving all the sentences in the book in Japanese characters and Roman transliteration with their respective English translation, an innovation most likely to prove very helpful....Mr. and Mrs. Vaccari have published a book of high merit and may be regarded as the initiators of a new system for teaching Japanese.

Howland Where Amelia

whaling out of New Bedford, sailed past and reported it. In 1857 Alfred G. Benson, of the American Guano Company, visited Howland, built a monument, hoisted the American flag, and formally claimed the island.

The guano was knee deep and Mr. Benson, for a number of years, sent boats to load caroges of it. Later the British found the island, helped themselves to the guano, laid claim to the island and leased it to guano gatherers.

Then Howland was forgotten. The decades passed and nobody went near it. So insignificant did it seem that, despite the pressure of land hunger, no nation coveted it.

Finally a new idea went careering about the world. Men had learned to fly and, in their utter madness finally conceived the idea of crossing the vast Pacific in airplanes. A route to China was surveyed and it was found that a tiny island called Wake, which had come quite accidentally into the possession of the United States, provided a convenient stopping place on the way.

This caused Washington to wonder if there might be other tiny islands in the Pacific that might have strategic value if this idea of flying continued to grow. The bureau of air commerce wondered if there were others and where they were. It sent William T. Miller to find out. He is the second continental who ha seen Howland. He made head quarters in Honolulu and used the coast guard cutter Itasca for his prowling of the south seas.

He found three islands—Howland, Baker and Jarvis. That was late in 1934. The islands did not seem of much promise because they were not the sort of coral islands that have lagoons of still water that provide safe landing places for sea planes. Only land planes could use them.

Despite this, it might be well, the Bureau of Air Commerce decided, to take these tiny islands under the flag against the possibility of their becoming useful. It turned back the pages of history to find how territory was annexed in the old days when many nations were in the business of acquiring it. The safest way, it decided, was through colonization.

But its method was unique among colonizations. It recruited Hawaiian boys, native-born American citizens, on the theory that they knew instinctively how to get along on South Sea island. Three groups, each containing four boys, were taken to the islands by the Itasca. Camps were made for them, they were supplied, visited each three months. They liked it, stuck.

The colonies were planted in March, 1935. The facts of this annexation of these islands by the United States did not become known, however, for six months thereafter. It created quite a stir. Who, in this twentieth century, ever heard of colonization? It came near creating an international incident, also, because Britain, too, claimed the islands.

De Valera Greets Fliers

N. Y. Times

DUBLIN, July 6.—The first big flights from Ireland's transatlantic airport have been crowned with remarkable success. At 10:50 (Irish time) this morning the Pan American Clipper III swooped down as gracefully as a bird, coming to rest on the Shannon at Foynes after having completed the journey from Newfoundland in 12 hours 39 minutes. Ten minutes later the Caledonia landed in Botwood, completing the same journey westward in 15 hours 19 minutes. The first survey flights in which Ireland was proud to play a part were crowned with triumph.

On a little pier at Foynes awaiting the American craft were President Eamon de Valera, Commerce Minister Sean Lemass, United States Minister Alvin Owsley, the Mayor of Limerick and a host of other notables, while crowds lined the river edge. As the Clipper III came down to a perfect landing, thunderous cheers rose above the drone of her engines. Willing hands helped to moor the craft and when Commander Harold Gray, with his crew of six, neared the shore in a launch they received a great ovation. Looking spick and span, the youthful commander, with his crew standing in line in smart blue uniforms, acknowledged the reception with raised hands.

President de Valera was one of the first to step forward and shake the airmen warmly by the hand.

"Cead mile failte," or a hundred thousands welcomes in Gaelic, were the President's words of greeting.

Later to a group of pressmen, Captain Gray spoke modestly of his flying boat's crossing from the New to the Old World as a "nice little joy ride." The hope of 1,960 miles across the Atlantic was small, he said, by comparison with their trips across the Pacific in the last two years, when they covered 2,400 miles, flying as long as twenty-three hours when strong headwinds prevailed. After his experience today, Captain Gray observed:

"I don't think there should be any difficulty in operating regular service across the Atlantic."

Describing the flight, the Clipper skipper said: "It was a very pleasant journey which to me was remarkable from the fact that I saw light on the horizon all night long. It also was the longest flight through unbroken clouds I have yet made. After we got 200 miles from the coast of Newfoundland we were flying 12,000 feet, up over the clouds all the time. Then we ran into rain and mist just as we came near Ireland."

The radio station at Foynes, Captain Gray commented, was of valuable service. "We were in contact with your wireless station most of the way and able to get our bearings for the last 800 miles off the Irish coast."

During the trip the commander and crew were able to dine from a menu that included celery, olives, soup, salads and strawberries with cream. Nearing Ireland they had to shave and wash.

This afternoon the clipper's crew were guests of President de Valera at a state dinner held at Foynes. In a brief speech the President congratulated the fliers on having had supper in Newfoundland and breakfast in Ireland. He also congratulated Pan American Airways on the venture, expressing the hope that in a short time there would be regular air service between Ireland and America. Not only did he congratulate the American company but also the Imperial Airways on the Caledonia's brilliant crossing.

"Linking of the two continents by air," President de Valera said, "means a great deal, I think, for the world. Certainly for us in Ireland it means much to bring thte shores of America, where so many of our people live, closer. What we regarded as an impossible dream twenty or thirty years ago has come to pass."

Predicts Creation Of Americas' Court

By WINIFRED MALLON

N. Y. Times

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., July 6.—Creation, "in the near future," of an inter-American court of justice was predicted today by Dr. Pedro Martinez Fraga, Cuban Ambassador to the United States, in an address delivered before the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. The World War and its aftermath, he declared, had inclined the Western Hemisphere more than ever to trust to its own powers.

Nothing less than the organization and submission to a "valid World Court," empowered to administer a codified body of international law, would avail to save the present civilization from consuming itself in the fires of national ambitions, said Dr. Frank Kingdon, president of the University of Newark, another of the principal speakers.

Expressing disappointment with the League of Nations, Dr. Fraga said that although it seemed for a time that the Pan-American movement might be absorbed in the world movement started by the League, "it was not necessary to wait long to see that, unfortunately, the Wilsonian dreams were too good to be true and the Western Hemisphere decided to resume its conferences."

"America, disappointed in Europe, was trusting anew to its own powers," such a position, however, "diminishing in no way its universal activities, because in 1923, as now, many republics of the New World were members of the League of Nations."

Dr. Kingdon's Address

"The tragic anachronism of the twentieth century in unrestricted national sovereignty," Dr. Kingdon began. "In every arc of our lives except that of political organization we are international. The question left is whether the concept of sovereignty can be maintained in this one division of human affairs and organized society go on.

"At present, no nation has any recourse under injustice but an appeal to arms. An international law and a genuine world court will provide the machinery for the arbitrament of justice. If there is not enough decency among the nations to make such a world organization possible, then there is nothing left but to take the final counsel of despair and mobilize for Armageddon."

While to question the validity of national sovereignty and suggest so revolutionary an adjustment of international relations was to "touch the modern world on its most sensitive spot," the speaker maintained that his proposal represented the next duty of statesmanship.

"The combination of acquired patterns of behavior, economic interest and emotional symbolism has carried nationalistic passion to creational levels. It has become not so much a religion as a fanaticism, which not only restricts but threatens nationalism by leading directly to war, which defeats the best interests of nationalism itself."

No disavowal of national loyalty in its "comprehensive sense" was involved in his proposal, Dr. Kingdon argued, "but only the modification of the principle of sovereignty by which every nation claims the right to do precisely as it pleases without reference to any interest outside itself."

He advocated loyalty by each nation to its own culture as the "essential prerequisite to the finest kind of national development without which the total experience of humanity would be poorer."

But the nations "must surrender enough of their sovereignty to guarantee the security of the world, or that security will be destroyed by the inevitable clash of national ambitions."

The League of Nations "had the germ of the complete idea," but failed because it attempted to "compromise collective action with national sovereignty and so degenerated into a machine for maintaining the status quo."

Commercial arbitration in the United States and Latin America was reviewed by Herman G. Brock, vice president of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, who presented the record as the "contribution of the business men and lawyers of the Western Hemisphere, as private individuals, toward the maintenance of peace."

"Increasingly," Mr. Brock said, "men are coming to see that it is commercial and economic disputes that destroy good-will, and without good-will the step toward war is easily taken.

"This is one of the great reasons why the lawyers and business men of this country and of the Latin-American republics are forging as one strong link in the chain of peace-making and keeping a system whereby trade channels will not become clogged with disputes that offer the incentive to war but will remain the routes carrying good-will and friendship across this whole hemisphere."

Mr. Brock is acting chairman of the Inter-American Commercial Arbitration Commission.

Other speakers were Kirby Page of Philadelphia and Henry G. Ellisi, Superintendent of Schools of Petersburg, Va.

Gloucester Defeats Leicester At Cricket

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, July 16—A century in each innings by D.R. Wilcox, who share the captaincy of Essex with F.N. Pearce, was the outstanding feature of the first-class matches concluded today, which resulted as follows:

Gloucester defeating Leicester by two wickets.

Surrey beating Warwick by an innings and 190 runs;

Yorkshire beating Hampshire by four wickets;

Essex beating Kent by 259 runs;

Lancashire taking first innings points from Worcester;

Sussex gaining first innings points from Notts; and Derbyshire beating Somerset by 118 runs.

Wilcox made 104 and 129 to become the first player for some time to achieve the feat.

Ably backing up his skipper was Peter Smith, whose slow deliveries claimed a total of 12 victims for 129 runs—six for 64 and six for 65.

Two other bowling performances catching the eye were those of Geary, of Leicester, who took altogether 10 wickets for 95, and Gover, the Surrey fast bowler, who claimed 13 wickets for 108 runs.

Yorkshire's victory today put them further ahead in the Championship, as their nearest rivals, Sussex, were only able to claim first innings points.

Konoye Seeks

to him without embarrassment. He holds that high birth is an accident, yet his rank has enabled him to be of service to the Japanese nation. Supported by his natural ability, it has brought him to the front without those intrigues and entanglements which so often ensnare rising statesmen. He is a moderator, not an innovator, and his chief quality is good judgment.

When he talked to this correspondent on the future of government in Japan Prince Konoye made no prepared statements and kept clear of abstract propositions. To a victim of the foggy rotundities in which Japanese politicians hide their thoughts, it was half miraculous to encounter a man who thought concretely.

The relations of the Cabinet with the army were discussed. "The Cabinet will work in harmony with the army," said the Prince, "but cooperation with the army is not necessarily a military dictatorship. What our friends abroad have to remember is that we are Japanese and we do things in the Japanese way. That applies particularly to the position of the Japanese Army. It is, after all, the Japanese Army in the Japanese nation.

"The army is drawn from the whole manhood of the nation and is very close to the people. It would be quite impossible, according to Japanese ideas, that so large a part of the national family should not have an influence on our affairs. The navy has as much honor as the army and is as important to our safety, but by the nature of its duties it is not so close to the people and their domestic problems. How could the army be indifferent to farmers' difficulties when it is largely composed of farmers' sons?

"On some questions, such as defense, the army's influence has the greatest weight, but that is not a dictatorship. I understand that a dictator holds all the portfolios of the administration. Here, as you know, all departments except those of defense are in the hands of civilian ministers. As to civilian Ministers of War and the Navy, Japan has never had these—except for short temporary periods—and I don't think the public, or the Cabinet itself, would be satisfied to have such important posts held by politicians. I know that the latter system is used by America and England, but we understand our own ways best.

"Our friends abroad need not fear a military dictatorship simply because the army is deeply concerned with the state of the nation. The army respects the Constitution. And the central principle on which the Japanese Constitution is framed is the cooperation of all classes and elements in the nation under the supreme authority of the Emperor."

Like the Adamses and the Roosevelts, the Cecils and the Chamberlains, Prince Konoye was born to politics, and he has been guided along the road to his present position by that great master of doing what you can, Prince Kimmochi Saionji, who was Prime Minister at 57, escaped from assassins at 86 and now, at 88, is still the Emperor's highest adviser on the selection of Prime Ministers.

Saionji's two Prime Ministerships were behind him and Konoye's baccalaureate still before him when they met, not too satisfactorily, for the first time.

In a quiet Japanese house in Tanaka Street, Kyoto, a tall, frank-looking youngster of 22, wearing a Japanese student's uniform, sat on the floor talking to a handsome, aristocratic old man.

"I am Konoye," said the youngster, "the son of your old friend. I am a student of Kyoto Imperial University and I have come to pay my respects to Your Excellency."

Many years before Konoye was born, his father, destined to become President of the House of Peers, and called to pay his respects to Saionji, then the brilliant imperialist leader and rising statesman. The Konoye and the Saionji families were bound by ties of ancient sympathies.

Young Konoye's first conversation with Prince Saionji was stiff, because the old Prince called the young one "Your Excellency."

But other visits followed and the Elder Statesman was kind. Echoes of his own youth sounded in the student's talk, Saionji had heard the chimes of St. Sulpice at midnight, and had drunk deep at the springs of nineteenth-century French liberalism. Konoye, forty years later, was drawn to more turbid streams.

"I was melancholy and perplexed about my future. I read Tolstoy and felt oppressed by the injustice of the world."

But when he wrote these words—it was only a few months ago—he had won through to maturity and he characteristically rationalized his student mood. "As a result of his political activities my father had fallen deeply in debt. While he was active our home was filled with his supporters and my boyish vanity was flattered. After he passed away they ceased to come. Creditors pressed us for payment. For the first time I knew what chilly winds blow in this world of ours, and I became discontented and spiteful."

Writers of sketches in the vernacular press are now recalling that Konoye in his youth was pink, if not red. He came under the spell of Marx's logic, economic interpretation of society and faith in the State. He transferred from Kyoto to Tokyo Imperial University to attend the lectures of Dr. Hajime Kawakami, a noted Marxist scholar now expiating dangerous thoughts in a Japanese prison. Konoye was interested in the new doctrine of the economic State, but he also played first base in the university team, and a practical mind saved him from wandering with long-haired ones in the political wilderness. In observing his career, however, it is well to remember that his early bent was not formed by Anglo-American liberalism but by German faith in the authority of the State.

After he had been graduated with distinction in law, political science and philosophy, Konoye went to Saionji with a vague plan for renouncing his title and starting a new life in America. The old man gave homeopathic treatment in the form of a trip to Europe, and Konoye entered public life playing a small part on a tremendous stage. When Prince Saionji was chosen to head the Japanese delegation to the Versailles Peace Conference, he took the young Prince with him.

Konoye saw the world and returned to Japan and took his hereditary seat in the House of Peers. His education for leadership continued. He was chosen vice president in 1931 and two years later became president. He was marked as a rising man and many honorary appointments sought him out—presidency of the International Society for Cultural Relations, presidency of the Japan-Siam Society, presidency of the Dutch Indies-Japan Society, presidency of the Toa Dobun-kai (East Asian Common-Language Cultural Society).

Presidency of the Toa Dobun-kai carries with it the use of a Moorish-looking building next to the Tokyo Club, and here, some years ago Prince Konoye began assembling around him a group of men of his own age who, like him, were deeply interested in social politics. They came from all sections of society—soldiers and politicians, capitalists and labor leaders, and many of the young officials, midway in their career, from whom the executives of the Japanese administrative machine will be drawn in the next ten or twenty years. Only one qualification is needed for admission to the circle—an ardent interest in politics, but it has been noticed that the stayers are those who are losing faith in laisserfaire economics and nineteenth-century liberalism and drifting toward a belief in State control.

Here the intellectual colonels and majors, the young politicians and the young bureaucrats meet and discuss unorthodox ideas, and Konoye listens. From that circle there developed what the Tokyo Asahi called "an irresistible movement among people who are sick of shams and evasions to make him the leader of rising Japan."

Thus, though he is outside of the parties, Konoye is not without friends. When he accepted the Prime Ministership one comment was that his relations with the army would be smooth because he had so many friends in the all-important "middle stratum"—officers ranging from lieutenant colonel to major general who do the active work of the General Staff and the War Ministry.

Prince Konoye is the embodiment of the Japanese people's deep-seated conviction that they ought to act in harmony. In moving words he told the nation over the air that his government would "heal strife and allay friction."

Harmony is to be achieved by compromise, reforms by a gradual evolutionary process. There is no doubt that this is the ideal Japanese method.

"Educated to anticipate compromise as the issue of every dispute, the Japanese carry the spirit of concession into all controversies, and neither in the story of the individual nor in the history of the nation can the student find many examples of that implacable assertiveness which conviction begets in an Occidental." So wrote Brinkley, the historian of Japan.

In recent years, since the new ideology appeared, there have been signs of a sharper temper. But the danger Konoye's administration has to fear is less likely to come from a clash of ideologies than from economic events. The real question is who will do the compromising when the government has to choose between the two policies it has announced—replenishment of armaments and stabilization of the people's livelihood.

The eight members of the Political Council discharged today include General Chin Teh-chun, Mayor of Peiping, Mr. Ko Ting-yuan, representative in Nanking of General Sung Che-yuan, Mr. Liu Tse, Mr. Men Chi-chung, Mr. Chou Tso-min, President of the Kincheng Banking Corporation, Mr. Hsiao Chen-ying, General Shih Yu-san and General Shih Ching-ting.

Won't Invoke Dumping Laws Against Japan

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Aug. 2—Officials of the United States Treasury announced here today their refusal to invoke the anti-dumping provisions of the tariff laws against Japanese ammonium sulphate imports.

Acting-Secretary Stephen B. Gibbons, it was disclosed, has branded as unjustified, some of the charges by domestic concerns that ammonium sulphate is being dumped into the United States.

U.S. Destroyers Collide During Pacific Maneuvers

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

VALLEJO, Calif., Aug. 3—The 1,395-ton destroyer Worden arrived here today with a seven-foot hole in her stern. Although naval authorities here refused to comment, the Worden was reportedly in a collision with the destroyer Reid approximately 150 miles south of San Francisco yesterday night during maneuvers.

It was also reported here that the Reid is heading for the Mare Island navy yard for repairs.

India Congress Ends Deadlock On Constitution

Christian Science Monitor

LONDON, July 8—The decision of the working committee of the Indian National Congress to permit Congressmen to accept office in the newly constituted provincial legislative bodies removes the deadlock that has hitherto prevented anything like a complete functioning of the recently introduced democratic government in six areas containing 170,000,000 Indians. The announcement was made from the committee's meeting at Wardha in the Central Provinces of India.

As a result of this development all six legislatures, which have not yet met, are being called together this month.

It is understood that the minority government now in office in the provinces where the Congress holds majorities are prepared to give way in favor of ministers who command more general support. It is thus hoped to get the new arrangement into full working without delay.

Chief Political Party

The Indian National Congress is the chief political organization in the country.

In the last general elections the Congress won majorities in Madras, Bombay, Behar, Orissa, the Central Provinces and the United Provinces—as large as a major European power. The Congress then summarily refused to form governments in these areas on the ground that the powers reserved to the British governors made it necessary to destroy the new Constitution instead of working it. The British governors were thus compelled to constitute their Governments from the minority parties, although they recognized that these must necessarily be defeated as soon as the legislatures were called together. Such convocation had to be done under the new Constitution by the end of September. Uncertainty was thus created which the Congress decision has now terminated.

Plenty of Reproaches

The Congress Party still couples its acceptance of office with reproaches directed against the British authorities whose relations with the Indian people it describes as those of "exploiter and exploited." It also expresses somewhat the contradictory purposes for itself of "combating the new act on the one hand and prosecuting a constructive program on the other." Although this attitude is not one that promises well for the smooth working of the new Constitution, nevertheless the belief is entertained in Britsih circles that the new Congress ministers will be sobered by their responsibility and that they may yet set themselves to make the best they can out of the great opportunity for self-government that is now within their grasp.

Pressure Exerted

The present change in their attitude is attributed in large measure to the pressure exercised upon them by their supporters, especially in South India, where the desirability never has been fully acknowledged of standing aside from the Government.

Credit is also given here to the tact and patience displayed in the waiting policy pursued by the Secretary of State for India, the Marquis of Zetland, in London, and by the Marquis of Linlithgow, Viceroy of India.

Mahatma Gandhi, in this connection, while hesitant at first, appears in the end to have thrown his great influence on the side of moderation, eventually bringing into the accord Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the Congress President, who had been slower to realize the wisdom of the course now adopted.

Discount Rate On Franc Lowered To 4 Per Cent

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, Aug. 3—Bringing back the discount rate to the level before the last devaluation of the franc early last June, the Bank of France this morning lowered its official discount rate from 5 to 4 per cent. The rate had been raised from 4 to 6 per cent before devaluation and lowered to 5 per cent on July 6 as experts declared that the franc had reached a level where it could stand on its own feet.

Financial quarters, commenting upon the reduction in the bank rate, declared that experts are now confident in being able to hold the franc at its present level. They further expressed confidence that the government's recent economic decrees will go a long way toward stabilizing public finance.

Report On Future

tons a year will be reached, providing sufficient supplies of pig iron or scrap are forthcoming. "We are informed that a further substantial increase in productive capacity is expected to be made in the course of next year, and that preparations for further considerable extensions thereafter are also in progress."

On the question of the failure of the Jarrow proposals the report says: "As to the position of the local concerns, while they could not be wholly disinterested as to the prospect of a new undertaking which might hinder their own development, we do not think that, given their particular circumstances and responsibilities as to employment in their own immediate areas, their decision not to participate can be regard as unreasonable."

Due To Misunderstanding

While the committee are satisfied that much of the adverse criticism directed against the organized iron and steel industry was due to a misunderstanding of the position and largely unfounded, they nevertheless think it unfortunate "that there were not in existence at the time the proposals were under discussion any arrangements for ensuring that they—and any schemes of development of the like nature—should be considered in relation to the structure and organization of the industry as a whole, and to the national economy, and with fuller regard for all the social considerations involved than either the local concerns whose cooperation was sought, or even the federation itself, were competent to give. The desirability of such arrangements is in our view the outstanding lesson to be drawn from the Jarrow episode."

Boldyrev Named Health Commissar

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

MOSCOW, Aug. 2—Mr. M. F. Boldyrev, who is little known in Soviet politics, was today named Commissar of Health in the place of Commissar Grigory Kamynski whose dismissal was never publicly announced.

It was pointed out by the Moscow Bureau of the Associated Press that the newspaper Krasnaya Gazeta of Leningrad recently reported the existence of "Trotzky wreckers" in the public health institutions, citing "bad anti-smallpox vaccine" as an example of their work.

Meanwhile, it was reported here that many suicides are being committed among young communists and aviation groups. It was added that arrests are still continuing and that thousands, especially in the Ukraine, have been thrown out of the Communist Party.

Hayashi Says

should, at all times, stand transcending.

Must Seek Truth

In short, the university must be dominated neither by vulgar practicality nor short-sighted policies; it should seek after truth based on a lofty ideal; freely cultivate intellectual faculties; calmly gain culture; and thus prepare for the creation of a higher civilization and the establishment of a new and better era.

At the present moment, the world seems face to face with a very serious transition period. Due to the lessons derived from the fearful tragedies brought about by the World's War, mankind for once came to a reflection, internationol justice was loudly proclaimed, and international coordination was strongly insisted on, so that it seemed at one time as if the world were being ushered into a happy new bright era. But, instead, the revived flood of nationalism has overflown the whole world, and international frictions have been very much aggravated and, hand in hand with the tendency to condemn capitalism, social, economic, political disturbances everywhere uprising, the world seems to be standing on the very verge of a mighty reconstruction. In order to direct properly the future movement of the human race, keeping the ultimate ideal of civilization constantly in view and relying on the judgment based on truth; to discover a new light out of this uncanny darkness; and to create a fresh era of peace and prosperity from the midst of these chaos and suffering—to do all this, indeed, a great deal will depend upon the university education. If so, it is now quite urgently incumbent on the universities of every country, to dispel, to the best of their abilities, all these various obstacles that are threatening them on all sides, and thus perfecting their proper functions, to endeavor to fulfil the great duties that lie before them.

The nineteenth century distinguished itself by its advancement of physical and applied sciences; that is, during the period, the so called material civilization shone forth so brilliantly that the like of it has never been witnessed in the history of mankind. Still, spiritual science, or cultural science and social science do not seem to have progressed at the same pace. The century attained a wonderful success in the study of the relations between nature and man, but was not quite so successful in establishing a correct understanding of the relations between man and man. In this respect, there is still a large room to open up; and this is where lies a great defect, which is the source of various evils. If so, the question becomes naturally clear in what point the future civilization should show up its new characteristics. As the consequence, the problem, as to on what the university should direct its special attentions hereafter becomes also clarified. Let us, then believe that the building up of a spiritual civilization through the advancement of spiritual science is what we should most expect of the twentieth century.

Great Progress Made

Of course, a still further progress and development of physical science as such, are quite necessary. Whenever a scientist solves a problem, usually many more new problems spring up at once. There is no limit to scientific research; there is no forecasting scientific possibility. Besides, physical science is never merely physical. The love of mathematical truths, for instance, in the physical world is of the same root as that of reason and justice in the human life. The scientific method with which scientists study natural phenomena may be at once applied to the observation of human relations. In the study of nature, neither partiality nor prejudice is permitted. If, in the study of humanity, partiality and prejudice could be likewise eliminated, what new and wonderful revelations might be achieved! That physical science has made a long stride ahead of spiritual science may, perhaps, be said to be due to Providence that has thus suggested the way by which the latter might proceed forth. We naturally desire to place great expectation on the civilization that is newly coming. And if, among the many achievements to be realized hereafter through the instrumentality of the university as their central organ, we were to find these narrow prejudices and bigotries completely uprooted, and the relations between man and man, between race and race, and between nation and nation, correctly and thoroughly understood, nothing would better accelerate the mutual understanding and amity among the whole human race, and there would be no greater contribution towards the reconstruction of the world.

New Big Names

plated by Congress. In most instances, this has been done by use of various loopholes in the law, through which the alert taxpayer of sufficient wealth, who is willing to do so, can escape a portion of his burden.

"In some instances, taxes have been avoided by use of unreal transactions and intercorporate juggling which reflect not so much imperfections in the law or its enforcement, as a deficient sense of responsibility in the taxpayer."

Pittman Wants To Punish Political Demonstrators

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, August 2—Senator Key Pittman of Nevada, today introduced into the Upper House, a bill providing for punishment to political demonstrators who picket foreign embassies and legations at Washington on charges of misdemeanor. The Senator was careful to state that no recent incident prompted his proposal.

Roosevelt Warns

without distress at home and unsettlement abroad."

"We have seen," he said, "that the answer to the difficulties described cannot be found through international cooperation, since and agreement adequate for meeting existing difficulties could neither be negotiated nor enforced. We have seen that currency unsettlement is a cause of international tension and ill will, and that cooperative security by means of multilateral agreements is more chimerical than as regards political and territorial questions, since mere failure by one country to maintain a sound financial structure may well cause more loss and hardship to third countries than acts of armed agression.

"Fortunately, we need not resign ourselves to despair. In the same manner that wrongdoing on the part of others need not affect the character of an upright individual, so no country finds itself under compulsion to follow the path of currency depreciation and public extravagance, waiting for other countries to take the lead in introducing honesty into their monetary systems and common sense into their public finances.

"Nor does any country need to sit inert until an international agreement can be negotiated. Each country has in its power the means of escape from the problems which have been discussed; each would in comparatively short time gain positive advantage by adopting a policy of boldness and rectitude; each country which puts its own house in order not only affords an example to others but exerts cumulative pressure to force adherence to that example.

"Currency instability is unprofitable business for any nation or for the world as a whole. No important nation can for long outwit others in currency matters or obtain special advantages. Attempts to do so demonstrate that one nation is willing to be unfair to its neighbors; such attempts also invite reprisals. Prospects for international peace and prosperity will both be enhanced when efforts to employ currency instability as an instrument of national policy have again been deposited in the wastebasket for exploded panaceas."

The "impossibility" of international agreements at present was discussed by Dr. Robert McElroy, leader of the round table on "Essential Conditions for International Security" this afternoon, at which Mr. Cumberland's arguments were the subject of lively discussion.

Dr. McElroy is Harmsworth Professor of American History at Oxford University. For many years he was at Princeton, England, according to Dr. McElroy, is "extremely anxious" to get back on the gold standard, if it can in any way be done without further complicating a bad situation. He agreed that any nation would have to take such action alone, if at all, at this time.

"To get the countries to agree to do anything together now is the despair of reason," he said.

Mr. Alfred Nipkow of Yokohama spent the week-end in Karuizawa at the Mampei Hotel.

APPEAL FOR BOOKS

An appeal has been made by Mr. M. Henry, the acting superintendent of the Seamen's Club in Yokohama for books, magazines and periodicals for distribution on board the ships arriving at the port. The number of vessels arriving has increased to such an extent that the club has not been able to supply a sufficient number of books. The Club will be grateful for books or magazines in the English, French German or the Scandinavian languages and will gladly pay postage charges if sent by mail. Packages should be addressed to Mr. Henry at the Seamen's Club, 194 Yamashita-cho.

DR. SEI TSUKAMOTO DIES

Dr. Sei Tsukamoto, professor emeritus of the Tokyo Imperial University and well known architect who has been confined at his home, Hisakatamachi, Koishikawa, for some time died there at 4:48 a.m. Monday at the age of 69. The last rites will be held at the Zojoji Temple, Shibe, at 2 p.m. Wednesday.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The Oxford Group House Party will take place at the Nojiri Lake Hotel, Monday, August 23rd at 5 p.m. and will continue until Friday of that week, August 27th at noon. All Karuizawa residents who expect to attend for part or all of the time are urged to send in their applications as early as possible to Mr. Warren S. Reave, 113 Lake Nojiri, Kashiwabara, Nagano-ken. The registration fee is payable at the hotel.

Appeal Is Made

many steel works are a long way from ore beds, and the future supply of Spanish ore is uncertain, as is the immediate supply of coke for the furnaces; furthermore, the federation has already 122 blastfurnaces in operation, 12 of which were opened this year, and it does not regard the prospect of having to open new furnaces which might later be redundant with any equanimity.

The second point, reduction of exports, was met for the time being by an agreement with the National Federation of Scrap Iron and Steel Merchants, representing 600 firms and the bulk of the British industry. By this agreement, made on February 1 and to end with 1937, the firms concerned consented to stop exporting scrap when their current contracts expired, and in return the prices of all grades were stabilized.

Briton Remains Firm Believer In Steam Expresses

Observer

LONDON, July 17.—Sir Nigel Gresley, builder of famous railway engines and luxury, high-speed expresses, is a firm believer that even not yet have all the potentialities of steam in the service of transport been harnessed.

For a week now the Coronation streamlined express which he fashioned in secrecy in his workshop at Doncaster has been running between London and Edinburgh as the fastest service train in the British Empire. King's Cross and Waverley are now linked, twice a day, in six hours.

The run of 392¾ miles, with its innumerable checks, such as dips, hills, and curves, is not an easy one, and to maintain an average speed of 71.9 m.p.h. between London and York, and thereafter of 61.42 to Edinburgh, is felt to be all that is desirable.

"I do not see much chance of faster running to Edinburgh," Sir Nigel said, in discussing steam locomotives and railway travel in general. And he is certain that the only land traction that makes the six hours' run to Scotland technically and commercially possible is the steam locomotive.

How the L.N.E.R. brought the singularly successful Silver Jubilee express into being, to be followed a little later by the more luxurious sister, Coronation, might well become a separate chapter in transport history. Sir Nigel told me of a run he made from Berlin to Hamburg in 1934 in the Diesel-electric Flying Hamburger. It maintained speeds of 100 m.p.h. with smoothness on the pancake plain of Germany.

The Newcastle Run

"I was greatly impressed," Sir Nigel said, "and decided to see if the Germans could suggest something similar for our main line. I saw the builders of the train, and supplied them with full data of gradients, curves, and speed restriction on the King's Cross-Newcastle route.

"With their usual thoroughness the German engineers made an exhaustive investigation, and decided that for a train weighing 115 tons, of three coaches for 140 passengers, the times would be 4 hr. 17 min. in the up direction and 4 hr. 15½ min. in the down.

"We were not impressed, and felt that one of our own Pacific engines, drawing a train of greater weight, capacity, and comfort, could do better, and in a test run the mellow Papyrus reached King's Cross from Newcastle in 3 hr. 51 min. 48 sec., touching the then unheard-of speed of 108 m.p.h.

"That showed what could be done and decided our policy. The Silver Jubilee was built, linking London and Newcastle in exactly four hours, and today, after nearly two years of running, it is more popular than when it first began to run.

"Without doubt high-speed trains have come to stay. The Coronation, heavier and of more capacity than the Silver Jubilee, will keep her daily schedule with the same exactitude.

"The success of these trains is entirely due to the developed efficiency of the steam locomotive, which in a thermal sense is becoming more and more powerful. The whole question is one of acceleration, and for acceleration steam is undoubtedly the best. The German engineers failed to produce a satisfactory schedule of running between London and Newcastle because of the comparative slow rate of Diesel-electric acceleration.

The Cost of Steam

"For high-speed travel and normal railway running I have no doubt at all that the steam locomotive will continue to hold pride of place. Coal and not oil is our national product, and, apart from other considerations, the steam locomotive is much less at first cost than the Diesel-electric locomotive.

"The public, and business people in particular, want these extra high-speed trains, and are asking for their adoption between other great centers, but until we have engines of still greater power the weight of the trains must necessarily be limited, as in the case of the Silver Jubilee and the Coronation. But if the demand for longer and heavier trains is pressed, there is no insuperable difficulty in providing the engines."

Density of traffic, however, is one serious drawback. Running difficulties in England, Sir Nigel pointed out, are immeasurably increased by slow running goods trains. It is all a question of braking, and in this Britain has failed to progress as have other countries because of the difficulty and cost of fitting all waggons with continuous brakes.

There are approximately 1,500,000 waggons running on the British railways, of which about 700,000 are privately owned in the coal industry. "To fit the 1,500 waggons with continuous brakes might cost about £30,000,000," Sir Nigel points out, and he agrees that it is difficult to justify this great expenditure.

One interesting effect of the high-speed services is the lessening demand for sleeping cars. This tendency is not unwelcomed, for sleeping-car traffic is unremunerative. For the fee of £1 for a sleeping compartment to Scotland, each first-class passenger takes up the quite unreasonable train-space for four tons deadweight.

Hoare Stresses Precautions In An Aerial Raid

N. Y. Times

PORTSMOUTH, July 16.—Sir Samuel Hoare, the Home Secretary, before leaving for London today, issued the following message to those who took part in the air raid precautions exercises held at Portsmouth and Southampton in the early hours of this morning:—

I am very sorry that it has been impossible for me to address you personally, but I was most anxious to say how very glad I have been to see the first full-scale exercise of the air raid precautions service. The problem of air raid precautions is one which his Majesty's Government regard as of first importance and it is most gratifying to me to find such wholehearted cooperation from everyone concerned. I should like to thank all those upon whose shoulders so much work has fallen, and to express my appreciation to the volunteers who have come forward and assisted in the exercise with such enthusiasm.

There is still much work to be done in this very important matter, which affects almost every citizen in this country, and the practical examples which I have seen of the way in which the whole organization is now taking shape is a matter of great satisfaction. I have been very much impressed with all I have seen and I heartily congratulate all those who have taken part, and I can assure them all that the experience we have gained and the lessons we have learned will be of the utmost value in the preparation of schemes throughout the country.

Rescue Work

The necessity for every one of our big towns to have an air raid precautions service, trained by frequent exercise to function promptly was apparent to all who watched the practices at Portsmouth and Southamption. In each place the program was framed to include every class of rescue work likely to be needed in an air raid. With the exception that Southampton called out fire engines and Portsmouth did not, the demonstrations in both places had the same character.

Utility, not display, was the aim throughout. From a spectacular point of view the most effective incident was perhaps that watched by Sir Samuel Hoare at Portsmouth. After making an inspection at Southampton, he traveled to Portsmouth in an armored train which formed a link between the towns, and went to the Corporation yard at Copnor. Here was staged a scene representing a house wrecked by a bomb.

A special kind of firework was used to simulate the bomb. When this exploded the building burned realistically. At the same time imitation gas and water spouted up from bomb craters in the roadway, where mains were supposed to have been broken. In the house were a number of casualties. These in the first instance were dummies, the places of which were afterwards taken by men ad women who had volunteered to play the part of casualties.

The "Black Out"

First-aid parties got out the casualties on stretchers, decontaminated them of gas, and removed them in ambulances to hospital. Demolition squads set to work while repair squads mended the broken mains. All wore protection clothing, and for the most part worked in darkness, though a spotlight was occasionally turned on them so that spectators could follow what was happening.

Among the spectators were the chief constables of several big cities, and representatives of local authorities and of industrial and other organizations in all parts of the country. One thing that impressed the spectators, viewing the operations as a whole was the great difficulty of doing rescue work in a "black out."

It so happened that raiding airplanes were over Portsmouth at the time and groups of searchlights were sweeping the sky in quest of them. When the light beams were refracted earthward by low cloud the streets became illuminated. At all other periods the streets were inkily black.

Cooperation of the Public

Lights had been extinguished and the people stayed in their houses, thus leaving the streets clear for the exercises. All these were timed by Home Office umpires, who, I am told, considered as highly satisfactory the way in which the different precaution services responded to the call made upon them.

Wing Commander E. J. Hodsell, of the Home Office Air Raid Precautions Department, reviewing the exercises at an official conference today, said they had been a great success. The next thing would be an air raid precautions practice in daylight, but he could not say where it would be held.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Fainting Duck

Billie Gamble, who lives in Spiro, Oklahoma, once owned a duck that actually had fainting spells when frightened. Every time the duck saw a sudden movement or heard a loud noise, it would fall over in a faint just as though it were dead. Billie then douse the duck in water, it would gasp and quiver, and then come to. The duck died in a faint when Billie wasn't around to revive it.

The Eggspert

Amaya Porfiro recently startled the people of Jackson, Calif., when he ate 144 raw eggs at a single sitting in the Wong Lee Cafe of that city. He called for more eggs, but there were no more on hand. Amaya's record was established not long ago in Mexico when he sat down in front of 300 eggs and ate them all, raw. And he stands ready to repeat the performance any time a doubter will furnish the 300 eggs.

La Meri

FAMOUS DANCER TO ARRIVE SOON

La Meri, the beautiful dancer, will arrive in Japan in about two weeks to give recitals at the Hibiya Public Hall in September, the first performance being on September 16. In all she will give five recitals, giving 14 entirely different dances on each program. At the dance concerts La Meri will be assisted by Bassano Ramgopal, the Hindu dancer.

From the time she was a very small child La Meri showed a love of music and the dance. She was born of Spanish American parents, her home was on the Mexican border and on her many travels through the different countries of South America she learned the intricate steps and the rhythms of the dances of the various countries.

La Meri completed her general education at the Columbia University where she graduated in the arts school. After leaving the university she decided to take up dancing as a career and spent several years studying with famous dance masters . . . . Tarasoff and Vo inine (of the Cecchette school), Michio Ito and Uday Shandar (for the dances of the Orient) and Jose Oteru (for the Spanish dances.) Today La Meri is considered one of the authorities of many types of dancing. Versatility is her great point. She has 91 entirely different dances from all parts of the world to choose from.

La Meri made her debut in New York in May 1928 as a classical dancer and scored a great success. This was followed by a tour of more than one hundred cities in North, Central and South America. She was first seen in Europe at the Max Reinhardt Theaters in Berlin and Vienna and then she made a tour of the capitals of Europe. La Meri danced for the first time in London this year and her appeal to the public was so great that she gave no fewer than 23 recitals in four weeks.

Later she visited Australia and New Zealand where her recitals were equally successful. Other countries she has visited include Ceylon, India Burma, Malaya and Java. She gave 170 concerts in one year.

The recitals she will give in Tokyo are presented by Mr. A. D. Mr. Longden and the entire presentation is under the supervision of Mr. Guido Carreras. Tickets will be on sale at the Play Guide.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The famous annual river lantern festival, the "Toro Nagashi", under joint auspices of the Iwamurada Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and the Iwamurada Tourist Bureau, will take place again Friday, August 20, at Iwamurada, located a few miles from Karuizawa. Georgeous and elaborate floats will be on the waters of the Yugawa River, amidst the spectacular display of fireworks. Many thousands of people come here during this time of the year to participate in this annual gala celebration. Both banks along the river will be open to the public free of charge so that the spectators may be able to witness the most beautiful display of fireworks, and the colorful array of lanterns.

This spot can be reached by Karuizawa visitors by taking the train to Miyota, then by bus to Iwamurada, or by train to Kutsukake, then by bus to Iwamurada.

Wealthier Britain

they rushed in to move the adjournment of the House, to call upon the Government to withdraw them, to abandon the policy of non-intervention and to intervene on the side of the Spanish Government. I can hardly imagine a more deplorable exhibition of reckless irresponsibility than that. (Cheers.) To try and wreck these proposals before even the Committee had had a chance to look at them and see what they thought of them would, if it had been successful, have plunged Europe into a crisis of the very gravest kind.

The action of the Opposition was all the more astonishing because it came from people who are always claiming that they are the only ones who are really in favor of collective action. What happens? First of all they had an absolutely devastating reply from the Foreign Secretary. Then they were gravely rebuked by Sir Archibald Sinclair on behalf of the Opposition Liberals. Finally, they were trounced by Mr. Winston Churchill, and by that time they were so frightened that they did not dare go to a division, and they actually suffered the humiliating experience of having to put up one of their own members to talk their own motion out.

Can you wonder that the electors will not have anything to say to people who make such a display of irresolution and whose only idea of collective action appears to be collective retreat?

The Growth of Trade

This district was for a long time in the very trough of the depression. All those great industries and those bound up in their prosperity—iron and steel, coal and shipbuilding—have suffered most drastic restrictions in the demand for their productions, and Tees-side and Tyneside are among those black spots where unemployment has been most prolonged and severe. But what a different picture we see today.

If you take shipbuilding on the North-East Coast, on June 30, 1934, the tonnage under construction of merchant vessels only was 81,000 tons. On June 30, 1936, only two years afterwards, the amount under construction was 366,000—more than four times as much. When you come to steel and iron, the situation is even more striking. In 1931 the total annual output of steel in this country was just over 5,000,000 tons. In 1936 it had risen to 11,750,000 tons, and at present it is likely to reach 13,000,000 tons a year.

That does not take account of the expansion which will come very soon when the new plant which is now under construction comes into operation. When you consider that before the War we never even reached the 10,000,000 ton mark in a year, you will agree that that is a very remarkable achievement. It is an achievement due to the tariff which has been introduced by the National Government. At the same time the industry has been considerable increasing its efficiency and reducing its cost, so that it is now in a better condition to meet competition than ever before. All this increased activity is working through to the Special Areas. I notice that our opponents are not nearly so keen to debate the question of the Special Areas today as they were some years ago. I am not altogether surprised, because the figures of the unemployed in those areas have come down, since we passed the Special Areas Act, from 442,000 to 274,000—a decrease of no less than 38 per cent. (Cheers.)

The Rising Revenue

It may be interesting to you to note how the revenue has been affected by all the improvement that are taking place. The total revenue from taxes in 1934 amounted to £710,000,000. Last year it amounted to £783,000,000—an increase in two years of no less than £73,000,000. (Cheers.) That will give you some idea of the money which would have been available for reduction of debt, remission of taxes, and general improvements if it had not been all swallowed up by the need for rearmament. As it is, we can congratulate ourselves that when the necessity for rearmament came upon us our revenue had expanded so much that we were able to undertake it without unduly being subjected to strain.

I am glad to tell you that under the trusted guidance of the Minister for the Coordination of Defense, Sir Thomas Inskip, we are already far stronger than we were a year ago, and that every day adds to the power and efficiency of all the services of this country and to the completeness of the preparations which we are making to resist attack. Everybody knows that our arms will never be used for purposes of aggression. On the other hand, anyone who might be contemplating aggression would be likely to hesitate if, counting up the forces that might be brought against him, he reckoned on the power and resources of a Britain fully armed. (Cheers.)

Fortunately, although we had to meet a great bill for armaments, our revenue has expanded so rapidly that we still are able to find a great deal of money for other purposes. We have given a great deal of time and thought to the question how we can meet the difficulties of the farmers. They have had to contend with a disastrous fall in world prices, and have had to meet the competition of other countries who, by reason of their climate and soil, are more advantageously placed to produce certain commodities. Among the ways in which we have tried to help them we have found a considerable amount of money from the Exchequer by way of subsidies. I have a sort of idea in my bones that the farmers will presently be coming along and asking for more. All I want to say to them—I am not Chancellor of the Exchequer any more—is this:—Do not forget that the fund from which the subsidies come has got to be fed by taxes, and those taxes are largely derived from the profits of industry. Therefore, if we want to keep that fund alive, we must be careful that we do not destroy or seriously impair the purchasing power of the countries that buy our manufactures. We must remember also that agriculture and industry are not enemies of one another, but are dependent upon each other, and that it is the duty of the Government, which has to care for all the interests in the country, to try to hold the balance between them.

But there are other things besides agriculture upon which we have been able to spend money. There are social reforms. The first of them is concerned with the housing of the people. It is interesting to note that out of the number of houses built last year, which in itself was a record, no fewer than 142,000 were built to let, more than had ever been built to let in any year before, and the majority of them to let at comparatively low rates. I think we may say today the housing problem is solved except for two strongholds, the most difficult and troublesome of all to reduce, on which we are now at work. I mean the destruction of the slums and the extinction of overcrowding. I am glad to say that the anti-slum campaign is progressing very satisfactorily. Already, I am informed, some 800,000 people have been taken out of the slums and put into better quarters, and they are going still at the rate of 60,000 a week. Overcrowding has been perhaps delayed a little by the necessity of getting the slums out of the way, but we are now beginning to make good progress.

The second reform I want to mention is also under the care of the Minister of Health, my friend Sir Kingsley Wood, one of the cleverest and most progressive Ministers who ever held that office.

The one I refer to is the new salaried service of midwives which is going to come into operation on the first day of next month.

Last year the maternal death-rate was lower than it had been for 16 years. Now, when we get these new services, it will mean that throughout nearly the whole of the country every prospective mother, whatever her circumstances, will have made available to her the help of a qualified midwife, and I am confident that we shall see a further reduction in the figures of maternal mortality.

Referring to the Government's efforts to improve the national physique, Mr. Chamberlain said:—

When our plans are in full operation there will be a National College for the teaching and training of instructors and leaders of young people, and there will be financial assistance from the Treasury in order to give grants to get facilities for physical training and recreation.

What we have in mind is something which is much more than proficiency in what are called "physical jerks." Scientific physical training, as it is practised in Sweden, for instance, builds up a sound physique as a necessary foundation for good health, but it is also found by experience that those who learn to control their muscles learn to control their minds as well. I feel confident that when we get our scheme going throughout the country we shall not only be able to give our young people a new joy in life, a sense of their power to do what they want to do without undue fatigue, but we shall make them better citizens as well as better athletes.

POPULARIZATION SOUGHT FOR CULTURAL MOVIES

To popularize the cultural movies among the Japanese, the Cultural Film Department of the Shochiku Ofuna Movie Studio will take a memorial film of the wedding ceremonies, the graduation ceremonies and the birthday celebrations on the request of any applicant. About 300 agencies will be established throughout the city for this purpose.

WORLD WAR NURSE VOLUNTEERS FOR CHINA

A 53-year-old volunteer nurse, who served in the World War, Miss Ichi Sakurai, a resident of Kobe, applied in Kobe to be the volunteer nurse for the Japanese soldiers fighting in North China a few days ago. Moved by her patriotism, the army authorities recommended her as a member of the mission to console Japanese soldiers.

SIAMESE APE DIES

The Siamese long-armed ape at the Ueno Zoo died early in the morning August 10. He was sent by the Siamese Minister as a goodwill gift last spring.

WELFARE COMMISSIONERS SUPPORT GOVERNMENT

More than 2,000 social welfare commissioners from all parts of the city assembled at the Hibiya Band Stand on the morning of August 10 to take an oath to support the Government to overcome the present emergency. After the ceremony they proceeded to the grounds in front of the Imperial Palace to cheer.

CITY TO SURVEY TANK MEET AUDIENCE

The Tokyo City Statistics Bureau intends to make a survey of spectators at the Japan-American swimming meet which will be held for three days, from August 14, at the Meiji Shrine Pool. About 100 officials of the bureau will register the sex, age, occupation and means of transportation yy which they arrive at the pool. Similar investigations will be made at many sports events scheduled for this fall and next spring.

Aircraft Orders For $100,000,000 Seen 1937

Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK.—A new record in aircraft sales is expected during 1937, with billings likely to exceed $100,000,000, according to a survey by Fenner & Beane, New York Stock Exchange firm. This total would compare with the former sales peak of $77,000,000 reached in 1936 and with $71,000,000 in 1929.

Increased facilities and greater efficiency, the brokerage house believes, should allow the industry to carry down a larger proportion of these sales to profit. Billings in the first five months of 1937 were roughly $40,000,000 up 56.6 per cent over the same 1936 period.

The recent two-way crossing of the Atlantic may prove one of the most important events in aviation history, says the survey.

Manufacturing companies which have obtained important military and air transport business, it continues, as a group now enjoy unfilled orders of about $125,000,000. All have expanded facilities, some by as much as 100 per cent.

Labor disturbances form the largest single factor of doubt, the firm states, with signs that the American Federation of Labor will match the Committee for Industrial Organization's plans to organize the industry.

The results of the unfortunate series of accidents earlier in the year have been offset by increased advertising and seasonal factors, says the report. Larger planes are being used to increase the payload by as much as 50 per cent, without a corresponding advance in operating costs, and these have offset greater maintenance expenses.

"Although the percentage of available space actually occupied has been running below 1936 levels," says the survey, "traffic gains in prospect should restore the occupancy factor at least to the levels of a year ago, and on this basis earnings should be much more satisfactory."

Cunningham Defeats Fenske In Ontario

CRYSTAL BEACH, Ont., July 10—Barrel-chested Glenn Cunningham ran 1,500 meters in a slow 3:58 today and nosed out Charlie Fenske of Wisconsin University by two yards in the feature event of the Erie Club's track and field games.

Dennis Shore, South African quarter-mile king, was five yards ahead of Cornell University's track captain-elect, James Hamilton Hucker, to win the 400-meter event in 0:49.2. William Fritz, Canadian quarter-mile champion from Toronto, was third.

Little Stan Urbanowicz of Buffalo's East Side A. C. upset Walter Dittell, Cornell sophomore, to win the 100-meter dash in 11 seconds flat, shaving two-tenths from the Niagara District A. A. U. record.

Donny Meaden of Cornell set another district record when he breezed through the 800-meter run in 1:55.2 The old Niagara mark was 2:02.7.

Lawrence G. O'Connor, Canadian hurdle champion, beat Hucker in a special 110-meter hurdle event with a new Canadian mark of 0:14.8. O'Connor's former record was 0:15.2.

What Does John Lewis

mocracy. There is a certain incongruity in this, for his own union, the United Mine Workers, has often been governed with a heavy hand not unlike that of one of the economic barons he loves to bait.

When Daniel Tobin, head of the teamsters' union, charged him with being a dictator in an A.F. of L. convention, he replied.

"We give him the right to run his organization any way he wants, and we understand he runs it. Frankly and confidentially, we do the same."

Frankly and confidentially, one might add that in some ranks of labor only the heavy-fisted, beetle-browed type of leadership is appreciated or respected. The stony, glowering visage which the public sees in nearly all photographs of John L. Lewis is part of his stock in trade. The shaggy mane and the beefy shoulders, expressive of bull-necked power, are equally useful in keeping obstreperous union members in place and in driving a hard bargain for labor with certain tough-skinned business executives accustomed to driving hard bargains.

Mr. Lewis, as a capable actor, has cast himself in the role of an embodiment of American labor, particularly the more brawny section of it. Thousands of workers have flocked to him because he has given them the kind of leadership they can understand—though it may be a leadership with all the weaknesses of force. Many would as quickly flock away in the absence of visible returns. Mr. Lewis avers that in the long run he has only the power labor gives him and that this depends on the accuracy with which he interprets the worker's aspirations.

How far these aspirations will lead is the enigma of the C. I. O. Though Mr. Lewis has refused offers of more salary from his union or of lucrative positions in coal companies, he does not hesitate to ask much for the man in the ranks.

"A living wage?" he exploded, in answer to one interviewer's question. "No! We ask more than that. We demand for the unskilled workers a wage that will enable them to maintain themselves and their families in health and modern comfort, to purchase their own homes, to enable their children to obtain at least a high-school education and to provide against emergencies."

To get such a wage Lewis has led miners in strike after strike and usually won his contests. But the middle 1920's saw the fruits of these conflicts turn to ashes in the mouths of the miners. With the fall of coal consumption, mine after mine closed or went non-union, production moved to unorganized fields and thousands of men were left with nominally high wages but no work. Will the C. I. O. unions in the automobile, steel, radio, hotel and other industries gauge better the wage at which they can sell the maximum amount of their labor? Or will they push costs up to where the consumer will suffer and to where consumption—and consequently employment—must fall off?

"I abhor strikes," Lewis told the National Press Club. "I never wanted any strike if I could avoid it." He says he wants for labor simply an increased participation in an increasing productiveness of industry.

Shanghai Consular Corps Decides To File Representations

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SHANGHAI, Aug. 11—Decision to make representations to the Japanese and Chinese authorities, expressing the hope that efforts be made to prevent possible spread of hostilities to the Shanghai area was reached at a meeting of foreign consuls called yesterday evening by Mr. H. Aall, Norwegian consul here and doyen of the consular corps, it is reported here today.

It is further reported that the dean of the consular corps, acting in accordance with the decision, will pay a visit to Mr. O. K. Yui, Mayor of Greater Shanghai, and Mr. Suyemasa Akamoto, Japanese consul-general here, sometime today to make representations to that effect.

The members of the consular corps met in conference at the Norwegian consulate here yesterday evening, reportedly to discuss the markedly aggravated situation as a result of the outbreak at the Monument Road incident.

Exploitation Seen

Soviet State has only carried to its logical conclusion a development which has also made gigantic strides in many capitalist countries. If (as Engels acutely observed) the taking over of industries by the State is socialism, then Napoleon, who nationalized the tobacco industry in France, must count as one of the founders of socialism.

In that sense Stalin may be permitted to rank with Napoleon. In any other sense his claim to be regarded as a Socialist requires careful scrutiny.

The "principle of socialism," we are authoritatively informed by the new Soviet Constitution approved last December, is: "From each according to his ability, to each according to his work." Between socialism thus defined and capitalism there seems to be no more than a hairbreadth.

After all, the capitalist only takes from the worker "according to his ability" (la plus belle fille ne peut donner que ce qu'elle a), and asks for nothing better than to pay him "according to his work," unless the trade unions, more effective in democratic countries than in Soviet Russia, obstruct the adoption of this "Socialist" criterion.

Of the prevalence of such "Socialism" in contemporary Russia there is no doubt. There is immense differentiation of wages and salaries in the Soviet Union. The right of inheritance has been restored; deposits in savings banks and investment in State loans (with lottery drawings) are being effectively encouraged; and private incomes derived from "work and savings" are specifically protected by the new Constitution.

Question of the Origin

The creation of privileged grades, whose loyalty to the regime can be counted on, may be either a deliberate part of Stalin's policy or a natural consequence of the industrial revolution—or both.

"Side by side with the great majority, exclusively bond slaves to labor, there arises a class freed from directly productive labor, which looks after the general affairs of society, the direction of labor, State business, law, science, art, etc."

This description, from the pen of Engels, of the rise of capitalism applies word for word to what is now going on in the Soviet Union. The existence in Soviet Russia of "exploitation" in the Marxist sense can only be denied on the unlikely hypothesis that the will of Stalin and the will of the worker are one and the same and that the worker is therefore exploiting himself.

But if Stalin chooses to apply the label of socialism to a system which exhibits so many of the most characteristic symptoms of capitalism, none of his compatriots will dare to say him nay.

The capitalist observer need not be disconcerted to discover that Soviet socialism is, after all, only capitalism writ large. But what of the sincere and intelligent Russian Marxist who remembers the slogans of the glorious revolution of 1917? Leon Trotsky is known today in Soviet Russia not as Lenin's principal coadjutor but as the first and most wicked of counter-revolutionaries; and to be found in possession of any of his writing is a capital offense.

But how many Russians are there who, whether consciously influenced by Trotsky or not, believe with him that the revolution has been "betrayed" by Stalin and his bureaucracy? Is there, in this sense, a "Trotskyist opposition?" The question is difficult to answer.

Holds Proof Not Produced

The treason trials of August and January signally failed to prove the existence of a "Trotskyist conspiracy." But it is hard not to believe that many thousands of "old Bolsheviki" perceive today that the system evolved by Stalin is something very different from the system for which the Bolsheviki fought in 1917, and that the present regime, instead of moving toward the promised land of a classless society with no privileges and with distribution "to each according to his needs," is working night and day to establish and maintain a system based on precisely contrary premises.

Stalin, who may have an uneasy Marxist conscience, clearly suspects the existence of such a body of opinion, and thousands of unadvertised arrests, in addition to the notorious ones, have been made in the past two years in the attempt to eradicate this source of disloyalty to the regime.

But most of the victims of the Stalinist terror probably belong to a different category. During the last five years the party line has taken so many hairpin bends and the pace been so hot, that many competitors, with the best will in the world, have failed to stay the course.

Such was the sad case of E. B. Pashukanis, until recently rector of the Institute of Soviet Law and Vice Commissar of Justice. Down to last December Mr. Pashukanis had expounded in an able series of lectures and textbooks the Marxist-Leninist theory of law. According to this theory, law is an instrument of government in the hands of the ruling class. Like the State itself, it is essentially repressive in character, and is an evil which will ultimately wither away with the State.

The Soviet judge, argued Mr. Pashukanis, was entitled if need be to rise above the letter of the law and decide on the strength of what Lenin called his "revolutionary consciousness of right."

Conflict With Stalinism

But Mr. Pashukanis, in his rectorial and vice commissarial armchair, failed to move with the times. About the end of last year some acute critic (perhaps a professional rival) discovered a flagrant incompatibility between this doctrine and Stalinism. The theory of "the highest development of the power of the State" clearly required the rigid enforcement of State law, whose authority Mr. Pashukanis was so recklessly undermining.

In January Mr. Pashukanis was deposed from his official position. His numerous textbooks disappeared overnight from circulation, and his teaching was branded as "anarchic." Two months later he was arrested as a wrecker and a Trotskyist. His present whereabouts is unknown.

Litvinoff In Vienna, Traveling Incognito

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

VIENNA, Aug. 11—Despite strict silence on the part of Soviet legation officials, it was reliably reported here today that Soviet Foreign Commissar Maxim Litvinoff arrived here today from Moscow. It is understood that Mr. Litvinoff is traveling incognito and will stay at the Soviet legation during his sojourn here.

Questioned by newspapermen, officials of the press department of the Soviet Legation refused to deny or confirm news concerning Foreign Commissar Litvinoff's arrival.

Although officials failed to comment, it was reported that the Soviet official is consulting Professor H. Eppinger, famous physician. It was also learned that Mr. Litvinoff will shortly proceed to Carlsbad.

French Have Answer

increasing numbers it has cut the ground from under their feet; for the man who has to work only five days a week and earns enough to keep himself and his family is not going to do anything more violent than talk about the blessings of anything so abstract as "communism," especially when he reads about how it works in Russia. To his countrymen of the more fortuned classes Leon Blum has done that service and only they seem not to be willing to realize it.

But there remains the second issue, the one which has been the real cause of what little disturbance there has been in these recent years in French political and social life.

The country as a whole has been living beyond its means. The beginning of the trouble lay in the fact that France fought a war far beyond her capacity. For this should be remembered when war debts are discussed, that in so far as France was concerned the war would have been over in a far shorter time than four years if she had been alone. She hung on and on, piling up debt the while because she was holding the breach for others, for England especially. In doing so she perhaps saved liberty for herself and these others but she has remained ever since crushed beneath a load of debt which, even if the unpaid portion is not counted, far exceeded what tribute she might have had to pay to her conquerors if she had been defeated.

Again it can be said that what has been astonishing is that a people accustomed as the French are to easy, modest living within their means, without any great unexploited resources, diminished in population, should have gone so quietly through these years as they have done. They have twice submitted to a devaluation of the franc and within a few months life has readjusted itself. They have consented to taxation for the payment of that past war and for provision against another which per capita is higher than in any other country and has been a constant handicap to economic recovery.

Perhaps matters have not been managed very well. But then, what government does manage these matters well? And that is where the French revolutionaries enter again into the picture. Again and again in these past years they may have seemed to outsiders to have "interfered" with financial recovery. What they have more often done, in their own opinion at least, is to prevent financial recovery's being secured at the cost of more precious human rights.

Every now and then their vocal demands have sounded somewhat threatening—when they felt they were voicing the irritation every one was feeling at the failure of some new set of "decree laws" or "full powers" or increased taxation or new devaluation which was supposed to put an end to the nightmare of near-bankruptcy. At the last election there was much denunciation of the "two hundred families" (the aristocracy of finance and industry) and the Bank of France.

Much was made of it at the time. There were those, especially in France, who seemed to regard any change in the system of Regents which Napoleon set up as certain to be catastrophic. But the change was made and no catastrophe has followed. At worst there has been only a continuation of the same financial muddle as before. What, indeed, has been proved is that it takes even here a very great deal of agitation on the part of the "revolutionaries" to get anything done.

And then there is also this—that when the "revolutionaries" get into power momentarily they nearly always defeat themselves. They exaggerate. Being sentimentalists they fall quickly into the traps set for them by the wise and worldly.

That is why Left governments never last long. Even Mr. Blum, who only a few weeks ago was quite confidently making a rendezvous with his followers for a second birthday party, has fallen despite his big and solid majority in the Chamber, victim to a miscalculation as to the amount of water a bucket will hold if there is a hole in its side. And now it is the turn of Camille Chautemps and Georges Bonnet, who are neither of them revolutionaries, to try to govern and get things done in a way to suit their revolutionary supporters.

They will not succeed. Nobody ever does succeed in reaching that ideal of the revolutionary's. That is what keeps it alive. If they, or their successors, however, succeed in bringing back some measure of prosperity, some measure of confidence and some measure of comfort, then they will do what their fathers in early years of the Third Republic did—prevent that ever-present ferment among the French people from spreading and infecting the whole mass.

In trying to do so these men will be carrying out the traditional policy of the Radical Socialist party to which they belong. But this time they must go even more carefully than usual, for they are far more closely allied with the more advanced guard of Socialists and Communists than ever before. So we are certain to have as much lipservice as ever to the shibboleths of the democracy. There will be a great deal of historical parallel between the Radicals and the old Jacobins. To some extent, but with a gradual diminuendo, there will be parades and mass assemblies.

If, with all that, something really effective in the way of straightening out the financial tangle can be accomplished, if the ordinary French citizen can have his faith restored in his money and the worthwhileness of saving, if he has no longer any reason for getting excited except over abstract matters, then it may safely be predicted that France will quickly recover her old mood of easy, tolerance and turn her back again on doctrines and ideologies. Her revolutionaries even now sometimes go fishing, and if there are 3,000,000 revolutionaries there are certainly to be seen just now far more than 3,000,000 fishermen every Sunday on the banks of all her rivers and canals.

Whether these revolutionaries remain fishermen or these fishermen become revolutionaries will depend on the events of the next few months.

At present they are only muttering, "Why should our lives be burdened and made miserable by a load of debt?" If that load can be lifted or made easier they will soon enough return to their fishing. If it is not and after long patience it is proved that ordinary methods and systems have failed to give life a chance, then, of course, something else will have to be tried.

What form that "something else" will take cannot be foreseen; but this is certain: that liberty will never be allowed to die in France as it has died elsewhere.

SUMMER LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew's third summer leadership conference for 1937 opened Monday afternoon at Onabake, Ibaraki ken at the Seikokwai Noshikwan. This final conference for this year is conducted in the form of a Rural Workers' Training Institute and is operated for five days, ending next Friday afternoon. The North Tokyo Diocesan Rural Committee headed by the Reverend Makoto Okamura of Kawagoe, is host of the first training institute for Seikokwai rural workers among men and young men. Father Okamura is director of the Institute, while the Brotherhood's Committee on Rural Work, headed by the Reverend Takiji Yabumoto, Chairman is supporting the undertaking. Thirty picked clerical and lay rural workers representing the Seikokwai's dioceses of North Tokyo, Tohoku, Hokkaido, South Tokyo, Tokyo, Mid-Japan, Kyoto, Osaka and Kyushu are attending, while approximately 30 village men, women and young people of the Onabake village are participating in the demonstration sessions.

The object of the Rural Workers' Institute is to bring together country Church workers for a frank exchange of problems facing the Church's penetration of rural Japan. Such subjects as country Sunday Schools, Evangelism, Health, Youth, and rural education will be dealt with in morning lectures followed with practical demonstrational methods in the afternoon. Next week's Onabake meetings are being held in a pure rural center of Japan's life, Onabake being hardly more than a scattering of farmers houses, located five miles from the nearest railroad station, Sanuki, on the Joban line. The only transportation to and from Sanuki being foot or ox cart traffic.

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Japan in sponsoring rural workers' meetings is seeking to arouse greater technique in Christian work among young farmers. According to the 1937 Japan Christian Year Book "there are 9,600 rural villages in Japan with a population of 30,000,000. In only 30 of these rural villages is there a Protestant Christian Church. To this number however must be added another 99 churches located in small towns whose membership is largely composed of farmers. The Nippon Seikokwai reports 42 rural churches and chapels. The Japan Methodist church, the second largest denomination in Japan, can only report 15 distinctively rural village churches. These figures fairly accurately picture the unoccupied condition of the rural area. There are of course a large number of small town churches where there is a sprinkling of rural folk in the membership."

The growth of the Peasant Gospel School Movement which sprang from Dr. Toyohiko Kagawa's experiments has more or less captured the imagination of all rural-minded Christian leaders in every denomination with the result that during the past ten years an increasing number of such schools and institutes are now being held in the different rural sections of Japan. The Peasant Gospel Schools usually bring together about 25 young men, actual and potential village leaders for a period of a week and are given intensive training in Bible study, Christian history, group activity, home making, village betterment and improved farming methods. In many cases these young men go back to their villages and start something. Through this movement the churches are bringing the impact of Christian truth and personalities to bear upon present and future leaders in many villages. The movement is in a pioneering stage and has done considerable good for rural youth however it cannot be claimed that the Christian church in Japan has begun to develop a technique that will lead to Christian penetration of the vast rural population of Japan.

Princess Juliana

set dates largely from the shake-up of the war. It has had a somewhat anomalous position in the most stiffly Puritanical country in Europe; but last December The Hague was the scene of a little revolution which passed unheeded and unacknowledged at the time. Since then the position of the smart set has been surer.

Before Princess Juliana and Prince Bernhard were married, a number of the legations in The Hague gave little dances for them, and all the excellencies of the Witte, both Dutch and diplomatic, surged under the portecocheres in slowly rising waves of glossy top hats. One after another the British, French and German Legations obliged. The Belgian Legation intended to follow suit, but when the time came to submit the arrangements to the Princess, it was intimated that a cocktail party would be welcomed, the Princess, it was said, having never attended a cocktail party.

The horrified Belgian Legation was shaken to its depths, but it had no choice. The arrangements were accordingly revised.

When Princess Juliana and Prince Bernhard arrived, they went straight to the cocktail bar and remained there. Presently Queen Wilhelmina arrived. Amid an awed stillness, she, too, went straight to the cocktail bar, and for some of the Hollanders present the world came to its end right then and there. In a moment the Queen came out, received the guests who had not already been presented to her, and left. But the Princess and the Prince remained where they were, and all through the rest of the party the Dutch guests kept creeping past the open door of the little bar, casting furtive glances at a sight they had never seen before—their future Queen and her fiance, perched on their high stool at the bar, each with a cigarette and a cocktail, talking, laughing, obviously happy.

So ended an era of Dutch life. By this time Hollanders are beginning to find the new era not quite so incredible as some of them may have feared.

U.S. Senate Passes Army And Navy Housing Bills

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15—Speeding up its efforts to dispose of remaining legislation prior to adjournment, the Senate today passed and forwarded to the House three bills and one resolution, including the army and navy housing bills authorizing a total expenditure of $29,092,000.

Joining the House in defying a veto threat by President Roosevelt, the Senate passed the sugar control bill but introduced a few minor amendments which necessitated its return to the House for re-approval. A resolution was adopted to make crop control the first legislation on the agenda of the next session.

The House meanwhile passed and forwarded to the Senate a bill providing for reform of the executive branches of the government. It authorizes the President to reorganize, consolidate or abolish superfluous executive organs and to create a new department of public welfare.

Hull Sees Europe On Disaster Road

By LUCY SALAMANCA

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, July 17.—If definite and immediate steps are not taken to restore international trade and stabilize chaotic economic conditions abroad, Europe is on the way to unprecedented economic disaster.

If this mad race for armaments, concentration upon the militaristic aspects of life, and the policy of national self-sufficiency, which is autarchy, are not abandoned, nothing can stay the impending crash. Moreover, the United States cannot escape the influence of such a catastrophe.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull made these predictions in a decisive manner, addressing the writer across the gleaming expanse of his mahogany desk.

For Healthy World Trade

Secretary Hull is convinced that healthy international trade, based on fair play and just dealing and consideration of mutual rights and needs, is essential to world peace.

"There has never been such an opportunity," Secretary Hull emphasized, "for the great nations of the world to step forward and by their example establish a precedent in international dealing that can only result in similar action on the part of smaller nations. With such an example, it would be far less difficult to bring about the changed attitude of mind that is necessary to divert the thought and effort of national powers from militaristic pursuits to those pursuits which build permanent peace and prosperity.

"Trade relations that are based upon exchange of the surpluses of nations, and are conducted in a spirit of fair play, can have as a sure result the promotion of good feeling and better understanding between the nations involved. Such relationships have a soothing, a softening, a humanizing and mellowing effect upon one nation in its dealings with another."

But other nations answer that such a program for the establishment of world peace "will take too long."

"Some of the nations which are feverishly engaged in the armament race, while the entire international order is severely dislocated," the Secretary added, "say to me that centuries will be necessary to bring about this friendly relationship between national powers, but I say to them, 'What is the alternative?'

Denies War Is Inevitable

"There is no answer to that question, for armaments and war and continually recurring periods of economic disruption, of instability and chaos, certainly can never contribute to the aims of peace. There is no promise of peace in any channel but exercise of a philosophy that refuses to concede that war is inevitable. I have said before that war is not an act of God, but a crime of man, and its progenitors are those evil passions that are engendered by economic distress.

"No people will disarm while they are unemployed or in want, or suffering. The policy of isolation, of self-containment, of autarchy, that cuts one nation off from another, can only lead to moral isolation as well, and an intensified nationalism that breeds international friction, fear, envy, and resentment, and destroys the very foundations of world peace.

"No, there is no alternative. That is why it is desirable to establish this new point of view—as speedily as possible—a non-militaritsic point of view, which, through the revitalization of international law, will achieve renewal of those finer relationships between nations upon which freedom, peace, prosperity, and civilization itself depend."

What is the attitude of other powers generally toward the reciprocal trade agreement policy?

"There is a gradual trend," Mr. Hull said hopefully, "toward greater understanding of the tremendous significance of international trade relationships. There are definite indications that nations are coming to the realization of what may be accomplished by this means. Billions of additional dollars would be available for employment and the uses of prosperity if nations of the world would adopt programs for the freer interchange of their surpluses."

Sees Gain Through Pacts

The Secretary said that, despite droughts that curbed America's usual export of surplus agricultural products and necessitated agricultural imports instead, and in the face of the disjointed state of affairs in other nations and the fact that commerce is "tied up with selfish agreements," there has been improvement since the inauguration of those trade agreements which have been operating with other countries.

"The process of reducing trade barriers by negotiation with individual countries is from its very nature a gradual one," the Secretary observed, "and many factors enter into any consideration of figures. Nevertheless such evidence as we have indicates an unmistakable and continuing gain in American foreign trade, attributable in no small degree to the trade agreements program."

He mentioned the effect of the droughts upon the balance of trade.

"Since 1932," he explained, "imports have been increasing as well as exports and emphasis has been placed by some upon the increasing amounts of agricultural imports.

While our imports have increased within the last few years, such increases in agricultural products have been largely either in non-competitive commodities like coffee, silk or rubber, or in products in which there have been domestic shortages due to droughts. There has also been an increased demand due to economic recovery."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Great Grape Vine

The great grape vine is owned by Garrett and Company, viniculturists of Tyrrell County, North Carolina. It is an original vine of the English colonists who settled there between 1584 and 1587. In its 350 years of productive growth, the gnarled and twisted trunk has attained a diameter of more than twelve feet, supporting branches that spread out over a lmost an entire acre. The vine is of the Scuppernong variety. It still bears tons of fruit every year.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai Summer Library is now open to the public from 9 a.m. to 12 noon, and from 2 to 5 p.m. daily. This library, which is in the house alongside the Karuizawa Hall, will be open until the end of this month. Much valuable information concerning Japan and its people can be obtained from the many books there. All foreign residents are asked to take this opportunity to brush up on their knowledge on Japan.

Mrs. Hollatz from Copenhagen will lecture on Denmark and Greenland with lantern slides on Friday, August 20, at 8 p.m., at the Karuizawa Auditorium. No admission will be charged. All those interested are cordially invited to attend.

The adjourned meeting of the K. S. R. A. will be held on this coming Monday, August 23, at 9:30 a.m. in the Karuizawa Auditorium. All those concerned are asked to attend this meeting.

The Karuizawa Boy Scouts, supported by the Matsuzakaya Talkie Department, will present two benefit movie performances at the Karuizawa Hall Thursday, and Friday, at 7:30 p.m. A small admission charge of 50 sen will be charged both evenings. Members of the Karuizawa Hall will not be admitted free of charge.

On Thursday night, two European pictures will be screened, also Paramount Sound News and a cartoon for the foreign residents, and on Friday night, two Japanese pictures will be shown for the Japanese residents of this section. Tickets are obtainable at the Karuizawa Hall.

A charity Concert for the benefit of the Korean Kindergarten will be held on Friday and Saturday at 7:30 p.m. at the Japanese Union Church in Karuizawa, under the auspices of the Korean Union Church in cooperation with the Karuizawa Japanese Union Church. This concert was to be given August 16 and 17 but due to the Air Defense Maneuvers, the date was changed. Tickets for these performances can be obtained at the Kyobunkwan, Kikuya, Salvation Army Trade Store, Meiji Camp Store, and all hotels.

Mattern In Fairbanks To Join Plane Search

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

FAIRBANKS, Alaska Aug. 15—Hoping to repay a four-year old debt of gratitude to Chief Pilot Sigismund Levanevsky, James J. Mattern, famed American aviator, arrived here at 8:21 o'clock tonight from Oakland, California, to join in the search for the Soviet flying ace and five companions who failed to reach Fairbanks last Friday on a new transpolar hop from Moscow.

Mattern, whom Levanevsky rescued in 1933 after the American flier was forced down in Siberia during a round-the-world flight, took off from Oakland at 6:11 this morning and flew non-stop to Fairbanks in 14 hours and ten minutes. It is understood that he will start searching for the missing Soviet plane tomorrow.

For rescuing Mattern in 1933, Levanevsky was awarded the Order of the Red Star by the Soviet Government. Later, when he took part in the Chelyuskin rescue, he was made "Hero of the Soviet Union."

Firmer Policy In World Field Looms For U.S.

Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON, July 20.—Information which has come to light since Secretary of State Cordell Hull made his eight-point statement of foreign policy last week reveals that document as a guide post marking a highly significant choice by the Roosevelt Administration.

The choice is for a more aggressive and positive foreign policy involving closer alignment with the "democracies," more vigorous disapproval of the so-called "aggressor" nations, and further naval expansion to give weight to this new attitude. This road has been chosen instead of the alternative of emphasis at all times on American neutrality.

Secretary Hull's statement itself reveals very little of this background. Deprived of its surroundings and background, it would stand as a guarded expression of general principles to which almost anyone would easily subscribe. But when viewed within the framework of what is now known to be its content, it takes on this special importance.

Conflict of Views

Behind the statement is a long and hard-fought conflict of views. On one side has been an influential group composed of many professional experts on foreign policy, both within the State Department and outside, which has advocated a clear position of neutrality both as regards the Spanish civil war and Europe, and also toward China and the Far East.

This first, neutral, group has held that the United States is not going to go to war against Japan should it invade China again, nor against Germany for participating in Spain—nor against anyone else. Therefore, they argue, any expressions of disapproval of the actions of those countries are unrealistic and can serve no good purpose. Further, this group contends that by taking a relatively neutral position between the two major factions in Europe the United States may be able to act as a mediator between them, whereas any obvious leanings towards one side would compromise its value as a mediator.

Policy of Democracies

The second group has taken the position that right is on the side of the democracies, that the aggressive and dissatisfied natons must be halted if another great war is to be prevented, and that the United States should lend a hand towards halting them by use of its moral influence and by rearming more extensively as evidence to the world of the strength of democracy.

This second group is not a belligerent group. But it feels that values of great importance to civilization are at stake and that the only way to protect these values is for the democracies—particularly Britain and the United States—to stand together well armed for any possible danger. They believe that this course is the surest guarantee of peace on the ground that the aggressor group would never dare precipitate a war if it was clear that Britain, France and the United States were standing together.

Ever since Italy invaded Ethiopia these two conflicting points of view have been at work on the Administration and each has had its effect. Officially, neutrality has been the watchword. The neutral influence has generally predominated at the State Department. But there have been several significant deviations—almost all of which involved the White House.

The most striking deviation was President Roosevelt's vigorous praise of democracy and blunt criticism of dictatorship in his speech at Buenos Aires last December. This, coupled with the numerous visits which have been made here during the past six months by prominent British statesmen, has given rise in several European capitals to an assumption that the United States is working more and more into cooperation with Britain.

Views of Neutral Group

The neutrality group has been extremely anxious to counteract this impression and scored an important success in the visit of Prime Minister van Zeeland last month. They rendered him every possible courtesy and sought to create the impression that the attitude of the United States more closely parallels that of the neutral Oslo group than that of Britain.

This is the background of a decision taken some weeks ago to issue publicly a new statement of American foreign policy. Members of both groups were consulted. What came out last Friday under Secretary Hull's name is the result which is significant more for what it did not say than what it did. It is learned in competent and informed circles that the position and principles of the neutral group were ignored in the statement. That is to say, Mr. Hull was being urged to make a statement emphasizing American neutrality. Instead he made a statement expressing American approval of certain principles of international conduct. The criticism of the neutrals is not so much over the Hull principles, but over the fact that he said nothing whatever about neutrality. The word neutrality does not once appear in the statement.

What is not known is where the responsibility lies for this decision. The conciliatory points of the statement are undoubtedly Mr. Hull's own. The endorsement of tariff barrier reductions is his own personal program. Many more of the phrases have a ring familiar to those who know Mr. Hull. But the suspicion is shared by several observers that the important elements, the declaration that American interests and rights are affected by hostilities anywhere in the world and the strongly implied criticism of the aggressor nations, were ordered by the White House.

It is considered certain, at least, that Mr. Hull would not have said "we are prepared . . . to increase our armed forces" unless he had been either authorized or ordered to do so by the White House. For this phrase is the first official hint that further American rearmament is contemplated.

That certain influential individuals including Norman H. Davis, Ambassador-at-Large, have been urging a new naval expansion program including at least three more battleships beyond the two now under contract was reported as far back as May 19. But until now there has never been any indication that this view would prevail.

The statement of willingness to rearm as well as disarm provides just such an indication and it is today believed in many quarters that this statement will soon be followed by more tangible action. Japan's refusal to agree to a 14-inch limit on guns for battleships is believed to have influenced the President in the direction of the naval expansion program and Japan's current attitude toward China to further impress him with the necessity for a vigorous rearmament program which to parallel Britain's rearmament at least in regard to navies.

There is no evidence yet for assuming that the commitment to vigorous cooperation with the democracies, as opposed to the strict neutrality doctrine, is final or complete. The two doctrines are two roads. The Administration has tried a bit of each, its course marking a path back and forth between the two. The Hull statement puts it for the moment definitely back on the pro-democracies plus rearmament road where President Roosevelt apparently prefers it to be. How long it will stay on this road is uncertain. Strong influences favor the course of strict neutrality. Perhaps a compromise between the two can be evolved. But the tendency now is to go along the road marked "rearmed democracies—trespassers beware."

Golden Gate Fair Pictured By Rossi

By ANGELO J. ROSSI
Mayor of San Francisco

N. Y. Times

SAN FRANCISCO, July 4—To write the story of the 1939 Golden Gate International Exposition would be, in a fashion, the setting forth of a pocket edition of the history of Western America, of the nations along the mighty Pacific, and of San Francisco, picturesque and romantic, whose people have an unusual faculty for envisaging and achieving studendous projects.

Reasons for holding a world's fair are manifold; usually it is a spontaneous move to celebrate some important event. For San Francisco it is three events of striking moment. They are:

1. Completion of the $77,000,000 San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge.
2. Completion of the $35,000,000 Golden Gate Bridge.
3. Inauguration of air service to the Orient.

First, it was essential that a fitting site be secured, accessible to visitors and yet where the two great bridges, furnishing its motif, could be seen. An island site would be ideal. But where was the island?

The solution of this problem was typical of San Francisco. An island was built.

"Treasure Island" is Ready

North of Yerba Buena Island were shoals lying beneath from eleven to thirty feet of water. When a preliminary survey revealed that engineers could surmount myriad problems and built the island, the Federal Government agreed to appropriate $6,250,000 for its construction, with the proviso that the island be used as an airport at the conclusion of the exposition.

Today that island is virtually completed—a 400-acre plot reclaimed from the sea.

Though the exposition does not throw open its gates until Feb. 18, 1939, construction of buildings on Treasure Island is well under way.

Planners of the exposition made an early decision: The exposition must not be merely another world's fair. It must be unique, it must be educational, it must be beautiful, it must be entertaining. If these qualities are present, then it will be successful.

As the idea of the exposition germinated in the minds of the builders, it expanded along logical lines to its fruition—a pageant of the Pacific.

Having chosen the theme for the exposition, the next step was to make the buildings on Treasure Island conform.

Trees and Shrubs Brought In

Further to enhance the beauty of Treasure Island, it was decided to convert the fair site into a garden paradise. Some 4,000 trees, many of them from thirty-five to seventy-five feet in height, will be transplanted. Hundreds of thousands of shrubs and plants are now being concentrated for the great flora migration. The cost of the horticultural program alone is $1,300,000.

In order that the exposition be a true pageant of the Pacific, it is necessary, of course, that the nations of the Pacific cooperate to that end. This will be done in full measure. Already Japan has signified its intention of sending a comprehensive exhibit. So too have the Central American republics of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua.

Participation negotiations are now under way with New Zealand, Australia, other nations of the Orient, the republics of South America and European countries. France has indicated that its colonies, both in the Pacific and other parts of the world, will be represented with a colorful and spectacular exhibit.

Urgent

A distinguished bishop, while making a journey by rail, was unable to find his ticket when the inspector asked for it.

"Never mind, bishop," said the official, who knew him well. "I'll get it on my second round."

However, when the inspector passed through the coach again the ticket was still missing.

"Oh, well, bishop, it will be all right if you never find it," the inspector assured him.

"No, it won't" contradicted the bishop. "I've got to find that ticket. I want to know where I'm going."—Saint John Citizen.

British Paper Lauds Attitude Of Japanese On Tsingtao Incident

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

TSINGTAO, Aug. 17—Commenting on the charged Sino-Japanese situation arising from the alleged shooting of two Japanese sailors by a Chinese sniper here teh other day, the Tsingtao Times, a British-managed daily, pays high tribute today to the attitude being taken by the local Japanese authorities toward the serious local situation.

It points out that the Japanese authorities are willing to publicize all accounts available regarding the recent untoward incident to dispel any misunderstanding that might arise from the recent developments.

On the other hand, the journal indicates, the Chinese authorities have yet to manifest any good faith to brighten the gloomy atmosphere, because they have maintained only an insincere silence since the incident.

Iraquian Cabinet Resigns En Bloc

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

BAGDAD, Aug. 17—Unable to withstand the pressure of the Progressives and Nationalists, which has been growing stronger since the assassination last Wednesday of General Bakir Sidky, chief of the Iraquian army's general staff, Premier Seyyid Hikmat Sulaiman today tendered the collective resignation of his cabinet to King Ghazi I.

Mr. Djamil Madfai, former premier, was again entrusted by the King to form a new government. Most of the members thus far selected have at one time or other served in similar capacities with the Madfai or the Hashimi cabinets, it is learned. The Hashimi government fell following the coup d'etat last October which ushered in the Sulaiman government. Ever since last spring, however, the Nationalists and Progressives have been gaining strength.

General Abdu Latif, former minister of war, has been named to succeed General Sidky.

Later the Japanese officers paid a visit to the Navy Ministry, where a luncheon was offered in their honor. They will be entertained at a dinner at the Japanese Embassy here this evening.

The naval cadets, numbering 400, and other junior officers and men of the visiting squadron made sightseeing in the city and its suburbs. They are expected to proceed to Naples this evening, while it is learned, Vice-Admiral Koga and his staff will remain here until tomorrow evening.

40 Chinese Desert Japanese Freighter

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

HONGKONG, Aug. 17—With the general Sino-Japanese situation charged with grave hazards, a sensation was caused here today by the revelation that 40 Chinese members of the crew of the Japanese trading vessel Tosan Maru, 318 tons, deserted following its arrival here today.

While feverish efforts are made to enlist an emergency crew, the freighter is obliged to remain in port.

Marconi Held

earned greater fame as a diplomat, serving on the Italian Commission to the United States and as a plenipotentiary in the negotiations of the peace treaty between Italy and Austria and Bulgaria.

Marconi established the first commercial wireless communications between Europe and America in 1907. His right to basic patents has been upheld by numerous courts.

In recent years, Marconi has devoted himself to research under the Fascist regime. Premier Mussolini appointed him president of the national council of research in 1928 and of the Royal Academy of Italy in 1930. During the application of sanctions at the time of the Ethiopian War, Marconi and the research council constituted a first line of economic defense for Italy.

The inventor has been showered with honors. In 1909, he was, together with Professor Braun, awarded the Nobel Prize in physics. In the United States, honors and medals have been bestowed upon him by Yale, Columbia, and the Universities of Penhsylvania and Louisiana; the Franklin Institute; the American Society of Electrical Engineers, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and the American Institute of Mining Engineers.

In 1931, Marconi represented Italy at the Faraday celebrations in London; in 1933 he visited the Chicago Century of Progress Exposition and delivered an address. On this visit he received honorary degrees from Northwestern, Notre Dame and Loyola Universities.

The World's Revolving

and return. No doubt many of these will be kept from want by the generosity of Japanese, if not by Chinese who have wealth in Japan.

The Chinese who have had occasion to find out for themselves, know what those who live in Japan have learned. They would all know it and one day there would be less hate in China, and instead the good will that comes eventually with being well nourished, and confident of security, if they were permitted to do so.

But that would not suit the purposes of those who live by provoking disorder.

Japanese Boy Scout Leader In Berlin

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

BERLIN, Aug. 16—Dr. Hans von Tschammer und Osten, Reich Sports Leader, today accorded a warm welcome to Count Yoshinori Futara, Japanese Boy Scout leader now visiting Germany, in the House of German Sports here.

Seven members of the German Sports Board conferred with Count Futara regarding problems of education and the 12th Olympic Games to be held in Tokyo in 1940. The Reich Sports Leader then escorted Count Futara on a visit to the German Olympic Stadium.

It was meanwhile learned that Dr. Otto Kuemmel, chief curator of German Museums, will sail from Genoa next Thursday en route to Japan to make arrangements for a projected exhibition of Japanese classical art in Germany.

Soviet Cuts Policy

the familiar denunciations of the capitalist system.

But after the inauguration of the first Five-Year Plan in 1928 no further congress was convened for seven years. Denunciations of capitalist countries were no longer a convenient accompaniment of the policy of "socialism in a single State." In 1935, however, the Comintern rather unexpectedly revived, in a new guise, no longer as the enfant terrible, but as the obedient agent of Soviet foreign policy.

Fascism had supplanted capitalism as the enemy of the proletariat. The British or French or American worker striking against his capitalist employer can no longer count on the support, material or even moral, of the Comintern. The French Communist is adjured from Moscow not to vote against the military budgets even of a Right government in France.

The British Communist is urged to seek a common front with those Labor leaders whom he had previously learned to denounce as the worst enemies of the working class The Chinese Communist is ordered to cooperate with Chiang Kai-shek, formerly known as the butcher of the Chinese revolution, for the purpose of resistance to Japan.

Assumes Identical Interests

The present policy of the Comintern rests on the assumption that the political exigencies of the Soviet State are identical with the world-wide interests of the working class as a whole. It is not surprising that this assumption should be made by a body whose seat is in Moscow and whose non-Russian members have already regarded loyalty to the party line as their first duty. It is also not surprising that, outside the Soviet Union, the assumption should have found readier acceptance among Left intellectuals than among the workers themselves.

The foreign policy of Soviet Russia and the policy of the Comintern depend, therefore, no longer on principles which can be found in Marxist textbooks, but on the same considerations of enlightened self-interest which determine the foreign policies of democratic or Fascist countries.

Adherence to the party line is none the less rigidly enforced. One semi-official explanation of the recent execution of the eight generals is not that they were in the pay of Germany (for this story, though official, seems to reflect too much discredit on the intelligence of those who appointed them to the highest military posts), but that they were advocating a rapprochement with Germany.

The explanation is not plausible; for Marshal Mikhail N. Tukhachevsky in particular was known for his devotion to the Franco-Soviet pact and his support of a Franco-Soviet military alliance. But it is true enough that the firing squad or penal servitude would at the present time await any one in the Soviet Union who, however honestly, advocated German-Soviet friendship (just as it would have awaited, before 1933, any one who proposed that the Soviet Union should join the League of Nations). Whether the party line is based on principle or pure opportunism, deviation from it is equally fatal to the deviator.

A Western Invention

This is not to say that the foreign policy of Soviet Russia will not change. The theory is that the Soviet Government is interested in the creation of a "Left front" for the defense of democracy against fascism is a Western invention which receives no support from the official exponents of Soviet policy.

The present enemies of the Soviet Union are the so-called Fascist States; and Soviet propaganda can, therefore, be directed against fascism as a whole. But if one of the Fascist States were to detach itself from the group the Soviet Government would welcome the friendship of the seceder as cordially and wholeheartedly as that of any democratic country.

There was a period of Soviet-Italian friendship in 1930 when Mr. Litvinoff visited Rome and clinked glasses with Premier Mussolini. The student of international affairs will not exclude from his speculations a possible recurrence of this pleasing episode.

If the Soviet Government saw a favorable opportunity of securing the assistance of Japan against Germany, or of Germany against Japan, it would see no reason to shrink from such a step. Conversely, if a Right, or even a professedly Fascist, government came into power in France, this would not, in the eyes of the Soviet authorities, affect Franco-Soviet friendship provided the foreign policy of France remained unchanged. The desire to line up against one another the conflicting ideologies of contemporary Europe belongs entirely to Chancellor Hitler, not to M. Stalin.

Of the aggressive Asiatic policy which was once so exasperating a thorn in the side of Lord Curzon, scarcely a trace remains. It is many years now since a congress of Eastern peoples swearing a holy crusade against the British Empire was held on Russian soil.

If the Comintern still nourishes a hope that the oppressed peoples of Africa and Asia will rise against the white capitalist, it keeps this ambition discreetly to itself. Of late years the Soviet Government has pursued a forward policy only on what is nominally Chinese soil—in Outer Mongolia and in Sinkiang, and its successful efforts to plant Soviet influence there were probably inspired by the fear of being anticipated by Japan rather than by any native urge to expand.

Nippon Day by Day

TOKYO STILL HAS 78 GAS STREET LAMPS

There are still 78 gas street lamps in Tokyo, of which 18 are used by the Tokyo Municipality and others by private citizens and institutions. The Tokyo Gas Company hires a number of employes to light and extinguish these lamps every day. The monthly fees of ¥3.40 for each gas lamp does not pay, but the company has not raised the rates since the Meiji era to preserve these reminders of the good old days.

SANSHIN RAILWAY OPENS TO TRAFFIC

The Sanshin railway line which connects Toyohashi Station on the Tokaido line and Tatsuno station on the Chuo line, a distance of 68.3 kilometers, opened to traffic on August 20. The new line runs along the Tenryu river and commands picturesque views at various points.

MOONLIGHT'S EFFECT ON CRABMEAT DEBUNKED

The old saying that crabs caught on moonlight nights have little meat and taste poorly is bunk, according to Dr. Ikusaku Amamiya of the Agriculture Department of the Tokyo Imperial University, who last year examined the weight of meat of about 600 crabs. He found that crabs are fat just before they cast off their carapaces, and lose their flesh suddenly after they do so, but this change has nothing to do with the moonlight or tides

COLLECTS QUEER COMBS

An ivory comb used by a Nara period court-lady in the eighth century, glass combs made in the Yedo period in the early 18th century, combs of aborigines of Taiwan, and other curious combs are among the collection of about 3,000 of Dr. Homei Kambayashi of Tokyo.

KABUKIZA TO FETE SOLDIERS' FAMILIES

The management of the Kabukiza theater will invite about 500 persons, members of whose families have been mobilized in connection with the Sino-Japanese incident, on August 23 and 24 to see the current program.

Huge Army Show Is Staged In Paris

By P. J. PHILIP

N. Y. Times

PARIS, July 14—There is nothing wrong with the French Army. War Minister Edouard Daladier showed it today to the people of Paris and to foreigners who attended this annual celebration of the taking of the Bastille.

He showed it as it has never been shown before, even two years ago when Premier Pierre Laval staged a record demonstration. Six hundred airplanes thundered across the Arc de Triomphe and down the Champs Elysees, where for more than two hours President Albert Le Brun, King Carol of Rumania, the Sultan of Morocco and members of the government saluted infantry, cavalry, light and heavy tanks, machine-gun corps, armored cars, sailors and artillerymen with huge naval guns, short mortars and light anti-aircraft guns.

Every part of the French Empire was represented. Chasseurs from the Alps, with skis slung over their shoulders, marched in front of the Sultan of Morocco's guard, huge black men in bright scarlet tunics, baggy trousers and white spats. There were special detachments of front-line men who keep watch in the fortresses of the Maginot Line, to whom their pillbox forts are as ships to sailors.

There were sailors and marines from Brittany, dragoons, lancers, colonial infantry and native troops on their little white Arabian horses. It seemed endless and perfect.

Airplane in Forced Landing

One incident marred the perfection of the order of the military display, but it served to add to its color. One of the 800 airplanes developed engine trouble. As it passed down the Champs Elysees it fell out of line and rapidly lost altitude.

Hundreds of thousands of spectators were massed along the Champs Elysees and in the Place de la Concorde. Breathless they watched it come. All could see the propellor was not turning. It seemed certain that scores would be killed or injured.

Yet there was no panic. Only for a second, as it sped toward the Concorde Bridge, did the spectators there break and run. Some stood as it passed only a few feet over their heads.

One man on the bridge explained that he was "so used to cinema stunts and real stunts that I did not believe there was actual danger."

With only three feet to spare, the pilot, Jean Paulhan, cleared the parapet of the bridge and dived with his new pursuit plane into the river. There was no space for a careful landing, for the Solferino bridge was only 200 yards further upstream.

Immediately one of the exhibition pleasure boats sped from its moorings and went to the rescue. Paulhan was stunned and half-drowned by the time he was extricated, but he will suffer no harm. His coolness in steering for the river saved his own life and scores of others.

In the afternoon Paulhan received the Military Medal for his courage and skill. Air Minister Pierre Cot delegated General Fequant to pin the medal on Paulhan's chest while the flier was still lying on a hospital bed.

Military Review Dominant

Last year Bastille Day was all political. There was the customary military parade in the morning, but its main event was a mass meeting of Popular Front members in the Place de la Nation in the afternoon. Rioting broke out in the Champs Elysees later when Right and Left forces clashed.

Today the military review dominated everything else. Leftist leaders assembled their forces in the east end and here and there were little skirmishes, with one side singing the "Internationale" and the other replying with the "Marseillaise." At Marseilles and Lille and in the working class district of Boulogne outside Paris political partisanship led to blows and shots.

But whereas last year's fete was characterized by the upraised clenched fist, this had none of the signs of revolution. One small disturbance at the Arc de Triomphe, when the memorial flames was rekindled, was quickly suppressed. Tonight Paris is dancing in the streets, with outdoor concerts given by some of the best music hall artists in the principal squares.

Vittorio Veneto

both offensive and defensive departments within the tonnage limits set by the Washington Naval Conference.

The Vittorio Veneto and the Littorio will be ready for service in 1939. They will be the mainstays of Italy's fleet which now has twenty-three cruisers, twenty-two flotilla leaders, forty-four destroyers, fifty-one torpedo boats, ninety-eight submarines and other smaller units in addition to four 24,000-ton capital ships, two of which, the Cesare and Cavour have been completely renovated and two others, the Doria and Duilio, are being rebuilt to improve their speed and equipment.

Plans "Ocean-Going Navy"

TRIESTE, Italy July 25.—The battleship Vittorio Veneto is the first tangible expression of Italy's determination to have "an ocean-going navy," one which will carry Italian seapower beyond the confines of the Mediterranean Sea, especially into the Red Sea, the Black Sea and the Indian Ocean, following the eastward course of Italian imperial expansion.

This determination was given official expression in the Chamber of Deputies recently by Admiral Domenico Cavagnari, Under-Secretary of the Navy, whose announcement of a new naval program was considered by diplomats to indicate a desire to challenge Britain's naval power. Admiral Cavagnari was among the high officials at today's launching.

Forming part of the background in Trieste Harbor was the navy's First Battle Squadron. Visible on the ways near by was the pre-war battleshipp Doria undergoing thorough modernization.

A delegation from the German Labor Front joined their Italian comrades at the launching.

The Vittorio Veneto's sister ship Littorio is to be launched at Genoa probably on Oct. 28, the fifteenth anniversary of the day fascism seized power in Italy. Both ships were laid down on that day in 1934.

Work on these ships is far ahead of schedule. Observers pointed to the succession of Mediterranean crises involving Britain and Italy as a reason.

It has been authoritatively indicated that another 35,000-ton battleship will be laid down this year in the slip just vacated by the Vittorio Veneto, with a fourth to follow as soon as the Littorio has been launched.

Others Building Rivals

The Vittorio Veneto and her sister ship will be the last word in warship construction for about a year after their completion. Soon thereafter they will be superseded by 35,000-ton battleships under construction by other powers.

France's Richelieu is two years along and the Jean Bart is about a year behind. Britain laid down the King George V and Prince of Wales Jan. 1 and is to begin two more. Germany is understood to have begun a 35,000-ton ship last year. The United States has authorized construction on two this year.

Japan is believed to be planning to build at least four battleships shortly, but there has been no official announcement. Japan is not bound by the 35,000-ton limit to which other nations have adhered, but naval authorities do not believe she is planning bigger ships than that.

Beauty Means Nothing In Moving Pictures

Beauty doesn't mean so much as a snap of the fingers in Hollywood, and if motion pictures had to depend upon beauty alone, studios would go bankrupt within six months.

"So why not stop all this horn-tooting about beauty, and concentrate more on the things that count?" asks Director William A. Wellman, who directed the Selznick International technicolor production, "A Star Is Born," co-starring Janet Gaynor and Fredric March.

What, then, makes a star, Mr. Wellman?

"Only two things. First and foremost, screen personality. Secondly, talent."

And where does beauty enter the picture?

"It's just something that comes along for the ride. It happens to be the hitch-hiker of motion pictures, not the force behind them.

"Next time you stand in a crowd, you will notice one or two men or women who draw your attention almost irresistibly. You don't know what it is or why. There's just something about them that sets them apart.

"That's a brief explanation of screen personality. The only difference is this: It must be the kind the camera can pick up. Some of our stars—I'll mention no names—have very little personality in real life, but there's something extra there which only the camera can show.

"Hollywood producers," said Wellman, "have thrown millions away on beauty, without return. Along comes a sweet but not particularly beautiful girl. She plays in a bit. The fan mail bursts the letter box. Presto! The public has judged. A star is born."

About this thing called talent, Wellman had little to say.

"That's something almost anyone can recognize. It can be developed provided the spark is there. We have no trouble finding it or building it.

"The combination of 'that something' and talent, however, is what makes the search for new stars so difficult.

"More often than not, as I say, they are not found. They just happen along."

Farouk First King Of Modern Egypt

N. Y. Times

LONDON, July 29.—In the course of a brief ceremony before both Houses of Parliament this morning Farouk became the first King to ascend the throne of modern, independent Egypt. He is the first independent ruler of Egypt since the days of the Pharaohs. When King Fuad died in April of last year, Crown Prince Farouk was not quite 17 years old; therefore, a Regency Council was appointed to head the government until today when the King reached majority on his eighteenth birthday, according to the Islamic lunar calendar. Because the Egyptian King, like the Kings of all other Moslem countries, has not a crown; today's ceremonies in which Farouk assumed full constitutional powers is known as an investiture. However, on Farouk's eighteenth birthday, which is Feb. 11, according to the Western calendar, precendent will be established when a crown will be placed on Farouk's head at the time the formal coronation is being held.

Crowds Flock to Cairo

Since the beginning of the week thousands of people have flocked to Cairo from all parts of Egypt to witness the country's most elaborate spectacle in many years. During the past week Cairo was hardly recognizable beneath a blanket of bright decorations consisting of flags, banners and illuminations on all public buildings in the principal thoroughfares. Five huge triumph arches in different sections of the city complete the picture which amazed throngs of visitors, many of whom were seeing the capital for the first time.

Before dawn this morning crowds began to form along the procession route from the royal palace to the Parliament buildings. Promptly at 8:30 A. M. the King, accompanied by Premier Nahas and members of the Regency Council, left the palace. During the half an hour drive to Parliament scenes of wild enthusiasm, such as the country rarely has seen before, greeted the beloved young monarch.

In Parliament the King took the oath to "observe the Constitution and laws of the Egyptian people and to maintain national independence and integrity in its territory." Following his repeating the oath a twenty-one-gun salute was fired from the Parliament courtyard proclaiming the investiture of the new King. Queen Mother Nazli and the four Royal Princesses watched the proceedings from the royal box.

The remainder of the investiture ceremonies are being held Friday and Saturday. His Majesty is visiting the Elrifai mosque, where his father is buried, for his Friday prayers, when a brief religious ceremony of the investiture will be conducted by Sheikh Elazhar, Islamic ecclesiastical head. Farouk will then visit his father's tomb. Saturday the King will review the entire Egyptian Army, thus bringing to a close the three-day celebrations during which several social functions also will held in the palace.

In accordance with the Constitution, the Cabinet will tender its resignation to the King on Saturday. This, however, is merely a formality without political significance. The King is expected to request Premier Nahas to re-form the same Cabinet.

Early tonight Farouk broadcast a message to the nation pledging himself to be the first servant of his country. He thanked foreigners, in addition to Egyptians, for the loyalty shown today to his father-land and himself.

Popular in Country

Being the only son of the late King Fuad, Farouk is naturally popular throughout the country. From Farouk's first public appearance in an official capacity four years ago when he represented his father, who was ill, at a military air display, his friendly, democratic personality manifested itself. Since then every successive public appearance of Farouk as Crown Prince and King has served to make this even more apparent.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Charles Boyer's Dressing Gown

Although screen stars as a rule don't worry about patching their clothes when they wear out, Charles Boyer owns one article of apparel that has been repaired so many times that it's beginning to look like a candidate for the ragman.

It isn't French thrift, but sentiment, that prompts Boyer to cling to the dressing jacket he always dons between scenes when he's making a picture. The treasured garment, which the Walter Wanger star thinks more of than anything in his extensive wardrobe, dates from his Paris stage days. It is made of faded green knitted material and has capacious pockets for cigarets, pipes and tobacco pouches which Boyer carries in quantities.

During the filming of his new picture, Walter Wanger's "History is Made at Night," in which he is costarred with Jean Arthur and plays an immaculately attired Parisian, the antique dressing gown gave a note of incongruity to the ultra-modern surroundings.

Whatever scene is being shot, Boyer wears the patchy coat right up to the moment the director says "camera." An attendant hands him the coat for the scene and stands by to help him change back to "Old Patch" when the camera action is completed.

Speaking of the favorite fetishes of filmdom's celebrities, Gregg Toland's "little red pants" have "gone Hollywood."

The famous pair of miniature red flannels which have adorned the camera of Samuel Goldwyn's ace cinematographer for the past four years were revealed only recently as having taken a turn toward the gaudy—they now have lace on them!

The diminutive articles have become so much a part of the Toland camera equipment that he would not dream of starting a picture without hanging them perkily on the side of the machine.

It was only when Gregg started camera work on the Miriam Hopkins-Joel McCrea starring vehicle, "Woman Chases Man" that the spectacular change in the trousers was revealed.

No explanation was available for the rococo refurbishing.

But, then, Hollywood is a citadel of whimsy.

LEAVING FOR COLLEGE

Mr. and Mrs. John K. Linn and Miss Marion Linn came to Tokyo from Nojiri Tuesday to see off Mr. Kenneth Linn who is sailing on board the N.Y.K. liner Heian Maru for college in the United States.

NOJIRI LAKE ASSOCIATION MEETING

At the annual meeting of the Nojiri Lake Association which took place a week ago the officers for next year were elected. They are: Mr. D. C. Buchannan, president; Mrs. S. J. Teaze, vice-president; Mr. John Linn, secretary; Mr. S. D. Terry, treasurer; Mr. B. F. Shively, chairman of the athletic committee; Mr. C. C. Robinson, business manager; Mr. L. S. Albrright, legal affairs; Mr. Floyd Roberts, junior activities; Dr. C. W. Iglehart, church; Mr. G. E. Bott, community health.

The present chairman Mr. R. L. Durgin presided at the meeting.

Another outstanding decision made at the meeting was to build a new swimming pavilion by next summer.

NOJIRI NOTES

The weather conditions in Nojiri have been superb. All sports—golf, tennis, swimming, sailing, and baseball are in full swing. The Nojiri tennis tournaments have all been finished with the exception of the mixed doubles. The final results are as follows:

John Shively beat Joe Mickle 6-4, 7-5, 0-6, 6-4, 6-2. Both players were in excellent form, Mr. Mickle unexpectedly forcing his opponent to five sets.

Miss Hoekje and Mrs. McAlpine beat Mrs. Robinson and Mrs. Durgin in the finals of the Ladies Doubles.

On August 16, the Karuizawa tennis team arrived at 12:30 p.m. to play the Nojiri team. In the afternoon as many matches as possible were played. Unfortunately two of Karuizawa's best players were unable to come to Nojiri, and this made the visiting team weaker, with the result that the Nojiri team won with a wide margin to spare. At baseball on the following day the Karuizawa team was also beaten. The game was however, an exciting one and all the players enjoyed it very much. Most of the visitors returned to Karuizawa the following day, but a few stayed at Nojiri and enjoyed the swimming in the lake.

On Monday a concert was held in the auditorium. Mrs. McAlpine opened the program with three solos which were followed by solos from Mrs. Outerbrige and some violin solos by Mr. Canzoneri. Mr. Emerson again showed and appreciative audience how well he could play on the piano. The last item on the program was a play given by the younger members of the community. The play, which was about a certain misbehaving Queen, was acted well and was quite popular with the audience.

On August 14, a large party of the younger community members went across the lake to the Lake Side Hotel for supper and a dance.

On Sunday Mr. L. W. Moore took charge of the morning service and Mr. B. C. Moore gave an excellent sermon.

On Thursday night, Tuesday and Wednesday morning, the Nojiri district had air raid practices. All lights had to be out at the signal—a bugle blown from the middle of the lake, and anybody using a light of any kind was promptly corrected by the police. The community is very confident that it will be safe from all air raids now.

On August 19, the servants of the community had their annual picnic. This picnic is given by the church and is (for that reason) very popular with the servants!

Junior activities have been rapidly progressing. Lessons for carpentery, woodcarving, and cooking are being given weekly by various members of the community. The juniors are also having picnics and parties and now they have started their tennis tournaments. Every Thursday afternoon the juniors assemble and have current events, which are under the leadership of Mr. G. E. Bott. At these meetings the boys and girls discuss various important world events.

On August 17, the P.C.L. Movie Company visited the community and took a few pictures of the surrounding scenery.

On August 18, tea was served for the first time in the new boat-house. The boat-house is now in fit condition to be used for any community meetings, tea will be given every afternoon from now the same as it was last year.

The young men of the community are now practicing hard in preparation for the Sims Cup Race which is to be held on August 20. This year the race is to be 100 meters long instead of the former 100 yards. On the same day several other races are to be held. The swimmers who are participating in this race are, Erok Thorlaksson, Stuart Robinson, Ralf Felton, and Harvy Daniels

On August 18 the annual Fair Skipper's Sailing Race was held. In this race each boat was piloted by a lady. This year's race proved to be more exciting than most. Weather conditions were ideal for a race and the wind held out very well all through the afternoon. The wind was, however a little too strong for the skipper of the "Quest," because this boat, when nearly at the finish of the race, turned over. The Fair Skipper's Race does not count in the season's points, it is a separate race altogether. The race was won by the sailboat "Black Hawk" and the "Blue Nose" came second.

On August 20 the Japan Board of Tourist Industry Boat Race was held and on the following day there was a sailing relay.

On August 17, Mr. Kenneth Linn, a former student at Tokyo American School, left Nojiri to go to the United States in order to attend college. He has lived in Japan several years and he made many friends while he was here. On the same day Miss Elizabeth Throop, a former student of Shanghai American School, left for the United States to go to college in New York. Miss Throop has been to Nojiri before but she has lived in Shanghai most of the time.

On August 19. Mr. Mosher and Mr. Austen, both Canadian Academy teachers returned to Nojiri after staying at Lake Yamanaka Y. M. C. A. Camp. They are staying at Mr. Robinson's for a few days.

On August 16. Mr. R. L. Durgin returned from the Y. M. C. A. camp. and on the following day Messrs. Stuart Robinson and Harvey Daniels returned from the same camp.

On August 17, Miss Elizabeth Hancock a Canadian Academy teacher, arrived.

Soviet Bars Doors To Many Tourists

N. Y. Times

MOSCOW, July 28.—The current distrust of foreigners, no matter what their nationality, now is resulting in the denial of entry to scores of tourists, including many Americans, who have paid for Russian trips and who have obtained Soviet visas, after their arrival at a Soviet port.

The most recent example is reported by members of the Reliance cruise party, who left Moscow tonight for Leningrad after a short visit to the Soviet Union during which fifteen persons, including thirteen Americans, were barred from Soviet territory. Two members of the party were arrested for taking pictures of Soviet citizens' shoes.

The Reliance is only the latest, however, of a number of ships, passengers from which have been barred. Ships whose passengers have been excluded include the Franconia, the Kungsholm and the Rotterdam. The exact number of passengers aboard unable to go ashore even armed with Soviet visas, which presumably are granted only after investigation, cannot be given definitely because figures reported by the tourists vary.

Forty Confined to Ship

Figures on the Reliance party, which sailed from New York on June 30 on a cruise to the North Cape and the Baltic, including Russia, were confirmed tonight, however, by Max Hutter of Hapag, who accompanied the cruise group to Moscow. He said that of the 208 passengers booked for Moscow about forty had failed to come—some because they were barred from landing and others because members of their family or friends or traveling companions had been barred.

Among these were Mrs. A. C. Williams of New York; P. A. Mueller of New York, who was permitted to land but his wife was barred; A. M. Blake of New York, who passed the immigration inspector but his wife was excluded so he refused to enter Soviet territory.

Other Americans denied entrance to Soviet soil included Mrs. P. K. Miller and Miss Elizabeth Miller of New York and Mr. and Mrs. Staub of Short Hills, N. J. The Staubs were barred because they had placed their passports with their Soviet visas in pillowslips which were sent to a laundry in Stockholm and were macerated.

Three Germans were barred. They included the chief cruise director of the Reliance, Wilhelm Werner, who has visited the Soviet Union many times and the cashier. The latter was permitted to land, but the Soviet thought better of its permission and interrupted his dinner in the Hotel Astoria dining room in Leningrad and took him back to the ship.

Well Cared For

Passengers reported tonight that they had been well cared for, all except the arrested couple—who were in good humor about it, however—and chalked down their arrest as an interesting experience.

The arrested couple were William L. Wilson, vice president of the Nebraska City (Neb.) National Bank, and his wife. Their first experience was when they asked a policeman whether they could photograph the American Embassy office building. He said no, because the building was Soviet property.

This afternoon they took a walk up one of Moscow's principal streets and dismissed their Intourist guide while they walked back toward the Hotel National. Mr. Wilson met a man wearing bast boots—woven from the inner bark of trees—such as Russian peasants have worn from time immemorial.

He photographed the shoes. A Russian woman noticed him and denounced him to two policemen who conducted him and his wife to the nearest police station. Their Intourist guide, who had been following them, noticed this trouble and went with them.

They were treated courteously, but were required to identify themselves fully. They spent altogether an hour and a half in the police station. Most of this time apparently was taken up because the police officials had to get authority to examine their films and the official in charge of this function was out at the time.

At length the films were developed in a dark room on the premises. According to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, forty feet of film, including everything they had taken in Leningrad and Moscow, were confiscated.

Mr. Hutter said that Hapag would recompense the passengers who did not go ashore for the Russian part of the trip. He pays Intourist only for the passengers who actually land-

Bilateral Naval

Limitation of Naval Armament embodied in the Notes exchanged between the Government of the United Kingdom and the German Government of June 18, 1935, Germany was entitled in view of the existing strength of the aggregate forces of the British Commonwealth of Nations in that sub-category to construct five cruisers in sub-category (a)—i.e., cruisers with a maximum displacement of 10,000 tons and a maximum gun calibre of 8in. In the course of the discussions which took place between the representatives of the German and United Kingdom Governments in June, 1935, the German Government agreed, as their contribution to the limitation in the construction of large cruisers, to forgo their right to construct the fourth and fifth sub-category (a) cruisers, provided that no further vessels in this sub-category were laid down by any other Power. The Government of the United Kingdom having subsequently informed the German Government of the intention of the U. S. S. R. to construct seven vessels in sub-category (a) with a displacement of 8,000 tons and a gun calibre of 7.1in., the German Government informed the Government of the United Kingdom that they could no longer maintain their intention not to construct the fourth and fifth (a) cruisers, and the Government of the United Kingdom recognized that the German Government were entitled to regard the previous Anglo-German understanding on this point as having lapsed. It was therefore recognized by both Governments that the German Government had the right to lay down these two vessels at any time, or to acquire them by converting sub-category (b) into sub-category (a) cruisers. Nevertheless, in their earnest desire to prevent the loss of the building holiday for (a) cruisers which was agreed to in the London Naval Treaty, the German Government have stated that they are prepared not to avail themselves of their freedom of action unless special circumstances arise which may compel them to do so. Should they decide to exercise their rights in this respect they would before the work of construction or conversion is commenced notify the decision to the Government of the United Kingdom who would be authorized to transmit it confidentially to the other naval Powers with whom they are in similar treaty relations.

3. I have the honor to request your Excellency to confirm the above statement as correctly representing the position concerning this matter.

German Reply

Her von Ribbentrop to Mr. Eden

Your Excellency,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's Note of this day's date in which your Excellency stated your understanding of the position regarding Article 6 (1) of the Agreement for the Limitation of Naval Armament and the Exchange of Information concerning Naval Construction signed this day between the German Government and the Government of the United Kingdom, and in which your Excellency requested confirmation of this statement.

2. In reply, I have the honor to assure your Excellency that the statement in question is in accordance with the views of the German Government and is regarded by them as correctly representing the position concerning this matter.

Canada Will Try To Return Arid Areas To Cattle

By D. M. HALLIDAY

N.Y. Herald Tribune

TORONTO, July 24—Large drought-stricken areas of western Canada, contiguous to those of the north central states, will revert to grazing lands, and the cowboy will return to roam ranges which are now virtually deserts, under the Dominion government's comprehensive program for rehabilitating sections of Saskatchewan and Alberta which have been seriously affected by aridity for the eight year in succession.

The outlook for farmers in the droughtstricken area has become so hopeless that large numbers will be transferred to productive land through a cooperative arrangement between the provinces and the Department of Agriculture. Once prosperous villages are becoming ghost towns. For instance, there is no crop in the 3,500-square-mile district in which the village of Alsask is situated. Where once there was one family to every 150 acres, there is now only one to every 15,000 acres. A farm that formerly produced 50,000 bushels of wheat in one year now stands desert and deserted.

Two-Way Program Set

The federal program is divided roughly into two sections—a continuation of relief payments to drought-stricken farmers, and reclamation of ranch country, together with further expenditures on irrigation projects in land suitable for grain-growing.

Once-populous ranching areas of the prairies will be fenced off after being leased by the Department of Agriculture. They will be kept free of grazing so that grass may grow, bind the top soil against erosion and in a few years provide pasture for herds like those which once roamed the plains. Water will be provided by dams and dug-out construction.

Agreements will be reached with the provinces to keep settlers off these areas, and other homesteaders will be moved to other home sites. It is expected that this work will absorb a large number of western Canada's unemployed.

Worse Than Last Year

Farm Minister James Garfield Gardiner estimates the situation in the drought areas as worse than it was last year and wheat production the lowest on record based on present acreage. Alberta's yield may be an all-time low of 65,000,000 bushels, while Saskatchewan is expected to produce 50,000,000 bushels, as compared with a normal 200,000,000 bushels. Manitoba's estimate is 35,000,000 bushels, so that, deducting normal domestic requirements of 105,000,000 bushels, there will be little for export apart from 40,000,000 bushels of last year's crop carried over. There will be a consequent decline in Federal revenues, which, with the big treasury commitments for relief, makes the problem pressing in Ottawa.

However, Mr. Gardiner is optimistic that the dried-out areas will be restored eventually to production. Irrigation projects which were tried this year have convinced the federal department that work of this nature is beneficial.

Free freight carriage is provided on livestock shipped out of the dry areas to grazing land within the prairie provinces, provided the owner retains his title to the stock, the provinces and the railroads each contributing one third. The government will provide feed and fodder for such livestock as it agrees will be kept in the dry areas for breeding and milking purposes. The department is arranging to establish assembly areas and marketing points at which farmers may take their livestock to be classified and marketed with efficiency. These areas will be near water and pasture or fodder.

Of 600,000 persons affected by the drought in Saskatchewan, possibly 300,000 will require federal assistance of one kind or another. Possibly 100,000 in Alberta will require relief assistance.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Soldier of 18 Flags

General Henry Ronald Douglas MacIver was born off the coast of Virginia, of Scotch American parents in 1844. He was a modern reincarnation of the ancient Knight Errant. He fought under 18 flags, as an ensign in the India Army, Lieutenant in the Italian, Captain in the Spanish, Major in the Confederate, Lt. Colonel in the Mexican, Colonel in the French, Brigadier General in the Egyptian and Major General in the Serbian Armies. In addition he held rank in the armies of Cuba, Brazil, Argentine, Crete, Greece, Montenegro and Bosnia. He led an expedition for the conquest of New Guinea and was the American Consul in a Spanish port. He was in every respect the personification of the romantic soldier of fortune, fighting in every cause "for honor, for glamor and for justice."

Unbreakable Goggles

Not long ago, Pilot Joseph Smith, flying a transportation plane over a west coast route, was on a northbound trip from San Francisco to Seattle, and accidentally dropped his sun goggles out the window of the pilots' compartment in the nose of the plane. Caught in the terrific wind stream, the goggles were gone in an instant, fell 6000 feet and were lost in the immense Umpqua Forest. On his next trip, Pilot Smith dropped a note to the forest fire lookout station on Quartz Mountain, requesting them to look for his goggles, and two weeks later they were found and returned to him—unbroken. Howard Church, of the lookout station, who lives at 1127 East 3rd St., Roseburg, Oregon, was the finder.

A gold medallion, which is given annually to the retiring president, was presented to Mr. Wells at the dinner dance, which was held in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Astor. The presentation was made by Edwin R. Weeks, past president of the association.

The election of George Byerly of Peoria to the presidency of the National Retail Musical Instrument Dealers Association, one of the subsidiary groups meeting with the convention, was also announced. Another group, the National Association of Musical Merchandise Manufacturers, Inc., re-elected C. Frederick Martin as president.

Morocco Split

considerable number of newspapers and other periodicals in Arabic from Egypt, India and other lands. The French have not tried to overeducate and thus have avoided adding to the already overcrowded professions.

Books Distributed by Italy

The French authorities are busy trying to stop the distribution of books issued by the Italian Government with such titles as "What Italy is doing for Islam in Africa" and "Spiritual Protection of the Moslem Population." The books are expensively produced; photographs of mosques, hospitals and public buildings restored or built by Italy in Tripoli take up the greater part of each page, with the title in five languages, Italian, French, German, English, and Arabic.

Taking it all round it is probably safe to say that the civil war in Spain has accelerated the normal colonial problems in Morocco by at least five years in the last five months.

Things are not must brighter in European circles. Feeling is running high in Tangier owing to the presence in the streets of officials, partisans and refugees from both sides in Spain. Incidents are almost of daily occurrence, often with casualties and are likely to continue as long as the Communist papers continue to publish insults to Signor Benito Mussolini and the Italian sailors continue to march aggressively about the streets.

Political half tones are disappearing and no one describes any third party as being anything less definite than either Fascist or Communist. French officers will ask the "color" of a shop-keeper before giving their orders. Meetings of all sorts are continuously being held.

Decline in British Prestige

Everything is exaggerated; many British and French express their alarm at the rearmament of Ceuta with the help of German technicians, the majority of the British are disturbed by a decline of British prestige.

The natives were amazed at seeing English women passing through the Spanish Zone subjected to unusually thorough search without official protest.

Nevertheless for the tourist and the private inhabitant life is much as usual, ships call and trains run to time. The sun shines and the whole country is heavily carpeted with flowers. Living is cheap and to those who are not particularly interested to know whether their neighbors are Communist or Fascist, peaceful indeed.

The Italians and Communists may be throwing bottles at each other in the little market place while the visitor is having his bath but the visitor learns about it when he reads the local paper next day, probably hours after his anxious relatives have been shocked by an exaggerated report read over an English breakfast table.

202 Saloon Bars In South Africa Must Close Down

Christian Science Monitor

CAPE TOWN.—By the end of this year 202 out of the 220 saloon bars in South Africa are to be closed down.

This is because one of the clauses of the Liquor Act of 1928 provided that after 10 years no license would be renewed unless the saloons had in the meantime been converted into restaurant or hotels.

Hardly any of the bars have been so converted, but for the last year or two the liquor trade has urged the Minister of Justice to modify or suspend operation of the act. The temperance section, on the other hand, has strongly pressed for its full enforcement.

Commission Investigates

General Jan Christian Smuts, minister of justice, appointed a commssion to go thoroughly into the question, and when its report was presented to the House of Assembly, he asked members to look upon it as a judicial decision and as a sort of arbitration on a matter involving large financial interests.

The commission's recommendations were that of the 220 bars in the country only 18 should be allowed to continue in one form or another—10 in Johannesburg, four in Cape Town, and two each in Durban and Pretoria.

Although the original licenses of the remainder will not be renewed, they may, if desired, be converted into wine and malt licenses. This is a sop to the South African wine farmers and brewers, and, according to Mr. Leslie Blackwell, M.P., for Kensington, is an unfortunate clause in the view of temperance reformers.

His information, he said in the course of the debate in the House of Assembly, was that in the Transvaal where there was no sale to colored and native people, many of the bars would find it unprofitable to convert them into small hotels or into wine and malt houses. In the Cape, however, the vast majority would be converted into wine and malt licenses. They would continue in the same premises with the same clientele—and by far the greatest evil in the Cape Province arises, Mr. Blackwell maintained, from the sale of wine.

Cheap Wine Difficulty

"We are cursed in this country," he added, "with a major curse in the form of cheap, heavy, fortified wine. For 2d. or 1s. you can buy a quart bottle of heavy, fortified wine which has the alcoholic content of half a bottle of brandy."

There is no remedy for that major problem in this bill, Mr. Blackwell declared, pointing out that the only difference in these bars that are to be converted is that they are not to sell whisky or brandy. That, he added, makes no difference to the colored man because his main pabulum is heavy, fortified wine.

Despite this criticism, however, the fact that the great majority of the bars throughout the country are no longer to be allowed to sell spirits is regarded as a big step in the direction of temperance reform and the report of the commission and its adoption by Parliament has been received with great satisfaction by the churches and social organizations generally.

World Parade Of Scouts Led By Americans

N.Y. Herald Tribune

VOGELENZANG, The Netherlands, July 31—Led by the American contingent, 28,000 Boy Scouts, assembled from all parts of the world, paraded here today as Queen Wilhelmina officially opened the fifth World "Jamboree."

As the 305 Americans marched past, they gave the Queen a special greeting, whipping out small American flags and waving them. Queen Wilhelmina, wearing the Scout insignia which belonged to her late husband, Prince Henry, watched from a reviewing stand as boys representing thirty-one countries passed steadily during two hours.

The Chinese and Japanese delegations marched together, oblivious to the conflict between their countries in the Orient. Seven Arabs from Palestine and the Trinidad "delegation," a lone Scout from the West Indies island, were other highlights. Prince Gustav Adolf, leader of the Swedish delegation, was among the prominent personages on the stand with Queen Wilhelmina.

The Americans won general acclaim for the orderliness of their camp, regarded as the cleanest in the huge cantonment near the North Sea, four miles from Haarlem.

The Jamboree, the biggest in the history of scoutcraft, will continue for nine days under the direction of Chief Scout Lord Baden-Powell of Gilwell, formerly Sir Robert Baden-Powell.

The Jamboree, which has a Jacob's staff as its symbol, has brought to Vogelenzang 10,000 Dutch scouts, 8,000 British, 2,400 French and 860 Belgians. Most other European countries have contingents numbering between 100 and 600, while there are seventy-eight from the Netherlands East Indies and twenty-two from Curacao. Iceland has twenty-five here. Russia sixteen and Japan seven.

Germany, where scouting no longer exists, has none.

MacMillan Finds 500 Isles Where One Was Before

Christian Science Monitor

CHICAGO, July 30.—Discovery that Resolution Island, Arctic formation north of Labrador, is not one large island but 500 small ones was reported today by wireless from the expedition of Lieut. Commander Donald B. MacMillan.

E. F. McDonald, associate of Commander MacMillan in previous Arctic explorations, said his yacht Mizpah in Lake Michigan received word of the discovery in a message from Commander MacMillan.

Mr. McDonald said the MacMillan discovery "undoubtedly will necessitate a change in maps, navigation charts and atlases" which now show Resolution to be a single island about 175 miles long and 50 miles wide. He reported the message from Commander MacMillan said in part:

"We worked through the ice in Hudson Straits to Resolution Island and found it to be a mass of islands instead of one. A conservative estimate makes it to be a group consisting of at least 500 islands."

Red Orators Barred In New Zealand Public Work Camps

Christian Science Monitor

AUKLAND, N. Z.—Instructions have been given by the Minister of Public Works in the New Zealand Labor Government, Robert Semple, that social halls in public works camps are not to be used for Communist lectures.

"These halls have been built for the workers on the jobs and their wives and children to use for social intercourse, study and amusement, and not as incubators of the treacherous doctrine of Communism," says Mr. Semple. "If they are used for Communist lectures they will be closed. They were built at the expense of the nation to benefit those employed on the jobs, not for the purposes of propaganda by individuals who visit construction camps to preach sabotage and destruction."

Communist literature, which was described by Mr. Semple as "mental poison," will not be allowed in libraries at the camps. Mr. Semple said he did not refer to books on revolutionary history but to leaflets specially prepared in pamphlet form for the purpose of stirring up strife.

$1,261 For Year Called Average For Family Of 4

N.Y. Herald Tribune

WASHINGTON, July 31—The difference between the cost of living on a "maintenance level" was found to be less than 10 per cent, or $117 a year higher in the Middle Atlantic states than in the east south central region, in a study made public today by the Works Progress Administration.

The report placed the average annual cost "of self-support at the maintenance level of living for a four-person manual worker's family" at $1,261, and the average "emergency budget" cost at $903 for the fifty-nine cities covered in the survey, on the basis of March, 1935, prices. It estimated the amounts would have to be increased about $56 at March, 1937, price levels.

The study was undertaken to determine how much income the average unskilled working man must have "to provide himself and family with basic maintenance" in industrial and commercial cities, and whether the amount needed varied greatly from city to city and from region to region." It showed that the annual cost at the "maintenance level" ranged from a high of $1,415 in Washington, to a low of $1,130 in Moble, Ala., at March, 1935, prices, and from $1,014 in Washington to $810 in Wichita, Kan., at the "emergency level."

Only Basic Maintenance

In making public the report, Administrator Harry L. Hopkins emphasized that even the more costly of these budgets "in no sense provides a desirable standard of living for the American family." The higher standard, he explained, measures "only the amount required for basic maintenance, without provision for savings, while the lower standard is frankly an emergency level, insufficient to maintain health and physical efficiency for any considerable period of time."

The maintenance budget used to compute living costs was constructed for a four-person manual worker's family, consisting of the worker, his wife, a son, thirteen, and a daughter, eight.

Clothing Cut to Minimum

The man has a winter and a summer suit for Sunday and holiday wear, one overcoat, a felt and a straw hat, all of which are replaced every three years. He has three work shirts and two dress shirts, a small supply of underwear, one pair of dress shoes and two pairs of work shoes a year.

His wife buys a winter coat and a spring coat every three years. Her wool dress and her winter hat must be worn two years; one silk or rayon dress and three cotton house dresses are replaced annually. Her three cotton street dresses last two years. Every year she buys a summer hat, six pairs of cotton stockings and two of silk or rayon, a pair of pumps and a pair of oxfords, both of which are repaired twice. The two children are clothed with corresponding simplicity.

Red Chiefs Oust 'Tepid' Editors In Soviet Purge

Christian Science Monitor

MOSCOW, July 30.—Staffs of newspapers large and small in all parts of the Soviet Union have been thoroughly reorganized in recent weeks. Hundreds of journalists have been discharged and many been declared "enemies of the people" and apparently imprisoned or exiled. Additional dismissals of editors are reported almost daily.

From the nature of the reports it cannot be determined which editorial workers have been arrested and which only dismssed. The Commissariat of Internal Affairs has legal rights to exile political offenders for a maximum peroid of 10 years without announcing what charges are against them and without public trial. It is known, however, that several prominent Moscow editors have disappeared recently from public view.

Firm Stand Demanded

Reorganization of the press apparently is intended to remove not only convicted political opponents, but also those who have not supported the regime with satisfactory emphasis.

The Communist newspaper Pravda recently declared that "a genuine Bolshevik journalist cannot remain neutral in the face of anti-Bolshevik actions. He must prove constantly by every word and action that he supports our Stalinist central committee."

Moscow apparently lost confidence in many of the older journalists after the secret police collected evidence that several of them were disloyal to the present regime. They are being replaced by younger men and women whose training in conformity is expected to make them less likely to question government policy and action.

Watched By Party Leaders

Communist Party leaders in every district, according to a recent decision, are held responsible for any "mistake" in newspapers. The decision declares that "every party leader must watch every issue of every newspaper in his district to note every mistake and discover who is responsible for it."

Pravda recently declared that "every employe of our press from editor to proof reader must be profoundly devoted to communism."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Blind Fish

The fish in Echo River and the River Styx in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky are blind. They have lost their sight after millions of generations of life in complete darkness. There are two types—Chologaster Agassiz, with well-developed sightless eyes, and Amblyopsis Speleus, the most numerous, with greatly degenerated eyes. Both are colorless, with cartilege instead of bones, 3 or 4 inches long, and said to be viviparous.

Wooden Money

When Mr. Jeff McCord called on the job for his money for Lumber Dressing, the Goodwater Hardware Company, not having a check made a check out of this wood shingle for $36.75 and delivered sams to Mr. McCord. Mr. McCord endorsed same and paid to the Alabama Power Company, Mr. J. G. Willoughby, Agent, for his electric bill. Mr. Willoughby deposited the check with his cash and other checks and the bank credited the Alabama Power Co., and billed the Goodwater Hardware Co., as if this check had been made on the regular bank form.

Bill Forbids Green Shirts For Brazil Civil Servants

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil.—Government employes will be forbidden to wear green shirts, which are the uniform of the Brazilian Integralitas (Fascists), or any party insignia under a bill introduced in the House of Representatives recently. Offenders will be punished by suspension of from three to six months without pay and by dismissal for a second offense.

The bill also provides that public utility companies operating under government franchises are liable to lose their franchises if they permit workers to wear green shirts or Integralist or Communist insignia.

Meantime, Integralismo apparently grows stronger daily and now claims about 2,000,000 members and sympathizers. Integralist leaders say the movement will elect seventy to eighty Congressmen in January and hold the balance of power in the next Congress.

New York Acclaims

the cameras, drawing a long line of Russian cattle and trucks toward the station of "Saratursk." For this scene five hundred extras were hired and trained. The entire sequence, incidentally, was shot during a violent downpour, for the depressing effect of the rain, with the shabby refugees huddled on the boggy ground, was necessary to the mood director Feyder sought to capture.

Workers at the Denham Studios of Alexander Korda are still singing the praises of Miss Dietrich for her calmness in an emergency and for the prompt first aid she rendered when a railway accident occurred on the lot during the film's shooting.

In a sequence showing thousands of refugees boarding a train, one truck collapsed, hurling the extras down an embankment and injuring many.

Miss Dietrich, who was standing a few yards away, rushed to the injured and began administering first aid, tearing strips from her gown to bind the wounds of an old man who was seriously injured.

The star comforted the injured man until an ambulance arrived and even offered to rush him to the hospital in her car.

About Robert Donat . . . . He made his first appearance in London stock at the age of 16.

He was catapulted to world fame by Edward Small, the Reliance Pictures producer who, in the course of an international search for the ideal actor to play the "Count of Monte Cristo," recalled the excellent performance of the young man who had played Thomas Culpepper in "Henry VIII." Small saw the film again, confirmed his first impression, identified the young performer as Robert Donat and cabled Korda from Hollywood to get in touch with Donat. The rest is history.

He followed "Monte Cristo" with other triumphs in "The 39 Steps" and in "The Ghost Goes West," both of which gave him an opportunity to exercise his flair for comedy.

A rugged six-footer, Donat loves walking, fencing and riding. He is also fond of reading—anything from horror yarns to Tacitus, but dislikes "literary talk." His favorite foods are roast beef, ham and eggs, bean soup and apple pie. He weighs 185 pounds, has brown hair and brown eyes. His father and mother are naturalized American citizens and live on a farm near New York.

Let's listen now to what director Jacques Feyder has to say about the film:

"When I started to study the problem of directing 'Knight Without Armor,' I decided that Marlene Dietrich under new direction might prove to be a sensitive instrument for a whole symphony of moods in acting. Always imprisoned within the bounds of directional ideas in which her earlier mentors specialized, she had never been granted free reign for her talents. Beautiful she is. That we all know. But is she emotional? That's what millions have been clamoring to find out in the theaters of the world.

"My theories about the great Dietrich I think are now proved correct. In 'Knight Without Armor' she runs the gamut of emotions—and she shows you that she feels each of them. She loves, she laughs, she hardens under adversity, she lolls lingeringly and very humanly in a tub-full of soap suds; she is regal—and then again, she is proletarian.

"If you will pardon my apparent boastfulness, I think I have started Miss Dietrich on a new life—a life on the screen in which she is not a Glamor Girl, but an actress. And by that I mean no static posense. I mean ACTRESS."

British Navy To Control Marine Air Services

LONDON—The British Navy has won its biggest battle since the World War and has obtained control of all naval air services which had been directed by the Air Ministry. The expected decision of the Cabinet will be announced in Commons on July 30 by Prime Minister Chamberlain, who accepted the report of Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister for the Coordination of Defense, after a five-month investigation into rival claims of the two services. At present airmen attached to the fleet are under a sort of dual control. Aboard ships they will be under the command of the senior naval officer, but all training establishments ashore are under the jurisdiction of the Air Ministry. Thus airmen may, in a single day, come under the command of Admiralty and the Air Ministry, which led to considerable irritations and impaired efficiency. It is expected that an effective transfer of authority will take several months.

Zionists Open 20th Congress

London Times

ZURICH, Aug. 2.—Among the messages of greeting read at the opening of the twentieth Zionist Congress here today was one from Mr. Ormsby-Gore, Secretary of State for the Colonies, now at Geneva, who wrote:—

"I and my colleagues will naturally study the outcome of your important deliberations with the greatest interest. We have reached the turning point in the history of Palestine, and my hope is that the deliberations now on foot will—if a long view is taken—result in peace, prosperity, and good government in Palestine, and will increase the welfare of all its inhabitants and promote good relations between the communities interested in the Holy Land."

Apart from the opening address by the president of the Zionist organization, Dr. Weizmann, there was, in addition to the references by the president, a special memorial address by Mr. Gruenbaum, a member of the executive, on the late Mr. Nahum Sokolow, the Zionist leader, historian, and litterateur who died over a year ago in London.

A Tragic Chapter

Dr. Weizmann, in his presidential address, said that they were meeting at a time when the situation of the Jewish people throughout the world showed elements of tragedy such as could rarely have been equalled even in Jewish history, rich as that history was in tragic chapters.

"Millions of Jews in Central and Eastern Europe now find themselves (he declared) not only deprived of their rights and citizenship, but robbed of their livelihood and of the very possibility of their existence. Never has the truth of the fundamental Zionist thesis been so clearly and so bitterly demonstrated as in the last four or five years. Only in the great democracies of Western Europe and America, and in a few of the smaller countries of Europe, can the Jews feel themselves secure and look forward with any confidence to the future."

Dr. Weizmann referred to the first Zionist Congress 40 years ago convened by Herzl, the author of the Jewish State, and the various stages Zionism had since passed through, and said he though they now stood at the parting of the ways.

"The dark days of terror and anarchy in Palestine in the past year provided them with one cause of thankfulness and pride (he continued). In spite of the reign of terror, the lack of adequate authority, and the ever-present menace of a reward to violence in the form of a suspension of immigration, the Jews of Palestine had held their own, and resisted all attacks with both heroism and restraint. They had passed triumphantly the first test of nationhood in their discipline and unity throughout those difficult months. In the new type of Jew who was emerging in Palestine Zion was indeed justified of her sons. Those who had given their lives had not given them in vain. In the two years since the last Congress the Jewish Palestine had shown marked progress. The Jewish economic structure had shown a marked accession of strength in various directions. The nucleus of a Jewish harbor had been created at Tel-Aviv; 15 new settlements had been founded, and two old ones rebuilt, and they had strengthened their financial and economic instruments."

Report and Mandate

Dr. Weizman spoke next of the Royal Commission and its Report.

"In spite of serious shortcomings the Report must command our very great respect (he said). It manifests in its historical analysis of the problem a sympathy, an appreciation, and an understanding of Jewish ideals and achievements which are as striking as they are unprecedented in a document of this order. But underlying the Report there is a fundamental misconception. The Report's main thesis is that the Mandate is inherently unworkable. That is a proposition which we deny, and our denial is supported by the record of achievement in almost every direction in Palestine in the years since 1922 to which the Commission's Report itself bears witness. But the Commission met in Palestine in an atmosphere vitiated and poisoned by six months of violence and terrorism: it failed to realize that some attempt at effective government might have nipped the trouble in the bud, and its perspective has been distorted accordingly. The Commission passed judgment in the shadow of events which should never have been allowed to take place. It is not the Mandate which is unworkable; the difficulty is that it has been administered by a half-hearted Administration which failed to make a serious attempt to work it.

"The characteristic feature of the Report is thus the remarkable inconsequence between its analysis of the problem and its conclusions and recommendations. Without dealing with the merits or demerits of the Commission's practical proposals, to which I shall refer at a later stage, I would merely call attention to the striking contradiction between the Commission's acknowledgment of the justice of our cause and of the benefits conferred by our work on the non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine, and its recommendations for the restriction of Jewish endeavor in practically every direction. It is a recommendation which seems to have fallen on all too willings ears so far as the Government are concerned. For in their Statement of Policy the Government, going in the circumstances beyond the Commission's own proposals, have announced their intention of imposing a political maximum on Jewish immigration of 8,000 persons for the next eight months—a step which appears to be in flat contradiction to the principles laid down in the Mandate, and against which we must register our strongest protest."

In conclusion Dr. Weizmann said that the decisions which they now had to make went to the very root of their existence and the heart of their movement.

Estonia Passes Law For Popular Reform

TALLINN, Estonia,—A new constitutional law, designed to reintroduce parliamentary conditions in the Republic of Estonia after more than two years of semi-dictatorial regime under President Konstantin Paets and General Laidoner, was passed recently by the National Assembly's two chambers in a joint session. Expected speedy resumption of parliamentary activities will alleviate existing dissatisfaction among adversaries of the present regime and deprive the extremists of their grievances.

According to the new law, Estonia adopts a democratic system wherein a two-chamber Parliament wields supreme power. The President is elected for six years among three candidates, nominated by two chambers and eighty special representatives for rural districts and towns.

The first chamber has eighty members elected by the nation and the second forty elected partly by professional corporations and partly by the President and administrative departments of the parishes. The new Constitution abolishes the state church and gives cultural autonomy to the country's minority populations whose national existence is recognized and guaranteed.

Early Marriages, Bigger Families Planned By Nazi

London Times

BERLIN, Aug. 3—Herr Reinhardt, State Secretary of the Finance Ministry, has announced as the latest of the Government's measures to increase the birthrate the impending enactment of a First Law for the Promotion of Early Marriage. The law will, in effect, make marriage compulsory for young Civil servants employed by the Finance Ministry, and presumably its principles will be extended to other branches of the Civil Service.

Hitherto young Civil servants have been able to resist the advice of their superiors to marry early on the ground that their salaries were inadequate. The law now will provide for higher salaries for married officials of the Finance Ministry, the additional payment amounting to 53 marks a month for inspectors, 85 marks for assessors, and 37 marks for probationers.

Having thus met this resistance and reduced the financial disadvantages of matrimony, the Finance Ministry sees no reason why its officers should not set a public example by early marriage.

"When your probationary period is over," said Herr Reinhardt to the students at the Ministry's college in Herrsching, "your transference to the establishment will depend on your being married."

Grants To Families

Herr Reinhardt announced also the extension of the system of grants to large families. Since August, 1936, the Government have been giving grants of 10 marks a month for the fifth and every additional child of insured fathers with incomes under 185 marks a month. These grants which have been costing the Government 5,000,000 marks a month, will now be available to insured families with incomes up to 200 marks a month, and to non-insured persons, particularly small tradesmen and farmers, whose assessed income is not more than 2,100 marks a year (about £170 at the present rate of exchange). In addition, the Government will continue the non-recurring grants to large families (five or more children) which they have distributed since October, 1935, at a total cost to date of 140,000,000 marks. Herr Reinhardt said that 410,000 of these grants had been made, averaging 340 marks. The marriage loans given since August, 1933, now total 785,000. The average amount was 610 marks, and the total sum involved 475,000,000 marks. Herr Reinhardt said that 600,000 children had been born to couples receiving marriage loans. For each child born of such marriages the State reduces the sum repayable by 25 per cent. Last year 28 per cent of the couples who married received loans.

Women in Industry

Herr Reinhardt said that financial assistance to marriage would be increased and the rearing of large families further encouraged as finances permitted. This is considered the more necessary because the introduction of two years' military service on top of six months' labor service has hindered early marriage. Young men are now much older before they can reach positions carrying salaries large enough to maintain a family.

The demands of the military services, in conjunction with the industrial recovery, have also narrowed the supply of useful candidates for industry, the professions, and the civil services. In the Finance Ministry, Herr Reinhardt announced, the situation was to be met by lowering the educational qualifications for for entry, although a compensating training would be given by the Ministry itself. The Labor Ministry is now discussing the possibility of of bringing women back into industry, after having driven them out in the first year of National Socialism to make jobs for men.

College Bans Text Books, Uses Movies

San Francisco News

WHITTIER, Aug. 6.—No more school books for Whittier College students. There will be movies instead.

Dr. W. O. Mendenhall, president of this Southern California college, announced last night that all text books will be abandoned, beginning with the fall semester, and the curriculum divided into four general courses.

"The teaching program, without the textbook method," he said, "will be supplanted by the use of adequate mechanical and scientific aids in learning. The use of sound and silent films and other audio-vocal aids will be frequent.

"The lecture system will be augmented. We are entering upon the new departure with profound conviction it is a marked improvement over the old more conventional plan."

Parran Lauds State Fund In Syphilis Fight

San Francisco News

Dr. Thomas Parran, the man who declared war on syphilis last year and propagandized the whole nation into enlisting in the battle, was in San Francisco today surveying the city, state and Federal public health services.

He regards San Francisco as an important center of public health work.

The pipe-smoking, grey-haired young-faced United States surgeon-general expects great results from California's appropriation of $150,000 in the campaign to control venereal disease.

Splendid Results Seen

"With a central state organization to guide and direct activities, and to give assistance to local communities which show a satisfactory program for investigation, treatment and control of syphilis, California may anticipate splendid results," he said.

He emphasized the importance of each community's studying its syphilis program, as to how much disease exists, what facilities there are for controlling it, and what further facilities are needed.

Dr. Parran urged each county to take a census of how many persons are under treatment for syphilis, in clinics, hospitals and by private physicians.

Compulsory Tests

On his program for locating all possible cases of syphilis—of which the victims themselves may be unaware—are compulsory Wassermann tests as a condition of issuing marriage licenses, Wasserman tests for every person admitted to a hospital, in every routine physical examination, life insurance examination and during pregnancy.

"One significant result of the campaign of publicity on syphilis," Dr. Parran declared, "is that syphilis is now being treated not only as a disease, but as an infectious disease.

Follow-up Work

"There is greater realization of the need for follow-up work on each case, to determine the source of infection, to determine how many persons have contacted that source and possibly become infected themselves, to determine how many persons a patient may have exposed to infection before coming under treatment."

INTERNATIONAL DEBATING TEAM ARRIVES

The International Debating Team from the University of Melbourne, now engaged upon a tour of the universities of the world, will arrive in Kobe from Hongkong on Friday on board the Empress of Asia. They will spend one month in Japan meeting the students of all the major universities, discussing with them problems of the day and student activities in general. The tour of Japan is under the sponsorship of the Kokusai Bunka Shinko Kai.

While Mr. Eckersley will remain here to continue his studies in the Japanese language, Messrs. Wilmot and Benjamin will continue on their way to the United States, where they will debate in sixteen of the major universities, and address meetings of the Public Questions Societies in four others. Among the subjects to be discussed are the following:

1. That present day commercial advertising is both socially and economically harmful.
2. That Western civilization kills personality.
3. That the policy of "collective security" is the best method of maintaining world peace.
4. That the cinema is a menace to culture.
5. That a pacific pact is necessary to maintain peace and economic welfare.

This the first time that such an enterprise has been undertaken by the Melbourne University.

Curious Hobby

Just as curious as the hobbies film players adopt are the ways they happen to find them. Pretty Rosalind Keith, who is co-featured with Don Terry in Columbia's "A Dangerous Adventure" soon to be released, now has a new diversion, stumbled upon while making this film.

Rosalind portrays a society girl who inherits a steel mill and decides to take an active interest in the business. Her first day's scenes seated the player at an actual executive's desk in a real mill, where the company had gone on location, and she began to glance through a trade magazine she found there.

It was profusely illustrated. Step by step it showed the making of steel. Rosalind was intrigued. A few days later, when the film company moved to another part of the plant, she saw the actual operations. Terry, Marc Lawrence, Dick Curtis and other players worked in the full glare of open-hearth furnace. The same man gave her two or three formulas, and told how the steel should be poured into molds and cooled.

The star bought the model equipment, complete to the last detail. A Columbia Studios workman made the mold designed. Three evenings of the most arduous application ensued, after which Rosalind presented to each company member a tiny steel rivet. Not much larger than a match head, each was perfectly fashioned of 21 carbon steel.

She plans to make more trinkets. These will be given as presents to be worn on charm bracelets.

Judge Gives Police Blame In Ford Riot

N. Y. Times

DETROIT, July 31.—Charges that Dearborn police "stood passively by" during a riot near the Ford Motor Company, May 26, formed the basis tonight for a third official inquiry into the beating of nearly a score of union members.

Common Pleas Judge Ralph W. Liddy asked the Safety Commission of suburban Dearborn, where the Ford company employs nearly 90,000 men, to discipline or remove five policemen and a police matron for "willful neglect of duty."

The commission will meet Monday night. Judge Liddy said it must try the persons accused.

A sergeant and two patrolmen, Judge Liddy charged took no action when members of the United Automobile Workers of America, seeking to distribute union handbills under a Dearborn city permit, "were subjected to physical abuse and detention to an extent unheard of in this community within the last generation."

Two official actions based on the fighting already are under way.

Judge Liddy, who conducted a one-man grand jury investigation of the May 26 disorder, has bound to Circuit Court for trial eight men on charges of assault with intent to do great bodily harm, less than the crime of murder. A ninth defendant has not been arrested.

150 Witnesses Examined

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner last night ended a month-long hearing on the NLRB complaint charging the Ford company with unfair labor practices and with instigating "malicious and brutal assaults" on the U. A. W. A. organizers who were beaten.

Examiner John T. Lindsay's report, accompanying more than 3,000 pages of conflicting testimony from nearly 150 witnesses, will go to the NLRB at Washington for action.

The attempted distribution of literature by union members May 26 was part of the U. A. W. A. campaign to unionize Ford employes.

An independent union of Ford workers, the Ford Brotherhood of America, sent to the Ford company today a renewed "demand for collective bargaining on behalf of about 25,000 of your employes."

The letter, signed by George I. Smith, F. B. A. trustee and treasurer, asserted two previous communications had gone unanswered and that the organization "must now insist on knowing your position in the matter before instituting proper proceedings" Smith said that the "proceedings" might take the form of a complaint to the NLRB.

U. A. W. A. officials have charged the F. B. A. was organized with the support of the Ford company. This was denied by the company.

Inspector is Accused

The presentment made by Judge Liddy to the Dearborn safety body named Inspector Charles W. Slamer, Sergeant Jeff Dean of the mounted division, Patrolmen Allen E. Wesser, Fred Herman and Clarence Snider and Police Matron Netta Hitchcock.

It charged the inspector was in charge of police near the Ford plant May 26 and "made no attempt to apprehend" those engaged in the riot. Dean, Wasser and Herman were accused of neglecting to prevent illegal acts.

Judge Liddy charged that at the Dearborn police station the matron "illegally, without knowing whether four women were arrested or not, searched their persons, their clothing, pocketbooks and forced two of the women to disrobe for further searching.

Snider, the presentment charged, ordered the women searched after they and four men were seized several blocks from the scene of the fighting; "acquiesced" in threats against a newspaper reporter whose notes were "forcibly taken from his possession," and "failed to heed the complaint of four women forced into a stranger's car on a public highway although the alleged culprits stood right besides him."

The women testified at a court inquiry that they were hustled into an automobile and ordered to the police station by men they believed to be employes of the Ford service department which polices company property.

Riot Described by Judge

Of the riot, Judge Liddy said:

"One man knocked into unconsciousness four men. Photographers stood around taking pictures of his activity, but the police of Dearborn did not see a thing which called for action. The assaults ranged in viciousness from knocking and pushing men and women around, kicking a woman in the stomach, to breaking a man's back."

The judge added the police "conceived of their duty as acting in the capacity of traffic patrol only" near the Ford plant, and that they "were misinformed as to the extent of the public property."

Describing growth of the Ford service department, Judge Liddy said:

"Difficulties naturally arise when those accustomed to authority within their own domain, attempt to enforce a non-existent authority on citizens who have no relations with them and who are properly on the public highways."

Designation of property near the Ford plant as public or private was a point of contention in the N. L. R. B. hearing. The Ford company insisted the U. A. W. A. men who were beaten were trespassing; the union asserted they were on public or "quasi-public" property.

Service men and their activities at the plant also were the subject of testimony. The U. A. W. presented evidence intended to show that Carl Brooks, present chief of police at Dearborn, was made a special officer several years ago at the instance of Harry Bennetti, Ford personnel director, who is in charge of the service department.

Briton Denies Guns Menace Gibraltar

N. Y. Times

LONDON, July 27—Two of the four biggest guns near Gibraltar have already been dismantled by Spanish Rebel authorities, Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister for Coordination of Defense, told the House of Commons tonight during a debate in which Winston Churchill and other members showed renewed anxiety over a possible threat at the entrance of the Mediterranean.

The fact was that these howitzers have been removed, said Sir Thomas, could be taken as "a straw which will indicate the course of the current." It may also have explained his reticence in not revealing the size or range of the guns in spite of incessant questioning.

A further clue to the Government's shyness may have been provided today by Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, who had a ninety-minute talk with Count Dino Grandi, Italian Ambassador, in the privacy of 10 Downing Street. Nothing is known of their discussion, but the natural inference is that it covered the entire field of Anglo-Italian relations.

Reconciliation Step Seen

Apparently the Prime Minister is making a determined effort as the real director of British foreign policy to produce a reconciliation between London and Rome. The existence of guns near Gibraltar may be helpful in such an effort, for if it is true that they were made and manned by Germany their presence at the gateway to the Mediterranean is at least as unpleasant for Italy as for Britain.

Sir Thomas insisted, however, that there was no need whatever for the House of Commons to be frightened over possible danger to the safety of Gibraltar or the freedom of British communications into the Mediterranean.

"No guns have been mounted in the Bay of Algeciras which can in the circumstances be regarded as constituting any threat to Gibraltar," he told the House. "A battery of four large Howitzers was mounted overlooking the straits, and, in fact, two have been removed. These howitzers were in the possession of the Spanish Government before the outbreak of the civil war, and the British Government has been advised that if they had been intended to be any threat to Gibraltar they would have been differently disposed.

"A howitzer is not a seaward gun. Somebody has suggested that a howitzer is likey to be a menace to shipping in the Straits of Gibraltar. The remainder of the guns are secondary in the Bay of Algeciras. They are few in number, and these guns, neither in number nor in size, threaten Gibraltar, nor are they sighted for that purpose. In all cases whether these guns are of larger caliber or secondary guns, they are all outpowered by the Gibraltar armament.

Finds No Cause for Scare

"In the circumstances of the Spanish civil war and in the light of events the presence of these guns is quite intelligible, and it is not necessary to imagine or invent any sinister intentions with regard to this country. There is no reason, the Government thinks, for raising the question at all or for any scare or anxiety as to the situation."

As for the opposite shore, Sir Thomas went on, Ceuta has "always been heavily armed."

"There were guns there before the war," he said. "It is true there have been additions to existing armaments, but the Government has been well aware of the guns, and except that every gun anywhere is a potential threat to anything that comes within its range it cannot be said these guns are a threat to Gibraltar or to shipping.

"It is quite true that if they were part and parcel of a larger design they would have to be considered as part of a great problem. I am only considering them as separate, as an incident apart from the whole question that is really proper to be considered by the Prime Minister or Foreign Secretary.

"After all, Ceuta is Spanish territory, and I suggest the government can be trusted to consider whatever importance the guns may have in relation to the whole of the circumstances, which, of course, are constantly kept under review."

The alleged menace of Gibraltar was first mentioned today by Mr. Churchill, who asserted fortification going on in the Mediterranean was "creating month by month a position this country never had to face before." But Mr. Churchill and the other speakers today did not limit themselves to alleged or imaginary perils.

For Speedier Rearming

They showed deep uneasiness over the rate of progress of British rearmament, especially on the home defense front, and demanded more speed and energy from the government.

"If one could be sure that ten years or even seven years of peace lay before the world," said Mr. Churchill, "I would hazard the opinion that the ground would master the air, and the problem of the marauding airplane slaughtering indiscriminately the civil population and seeking to blackmail nations out of their liberties by act of mass terrorism would have passed away as a menace to the civilized world.

"The next seven or eight years will be years of great anxiety and crisis for the world. It may well be that the continuance of our civilization may depend on whether peace can be maintained until the power of defending all communities from these indiscriminate and piratical attacks against the civil population has been fully reckoned.

"Those nations that have good arrangements for dealing with the civil population in air attacks will have a considerable advantage over the nation which has very small or poor arrangements for that purpose. I hope and trust that the British Government will concentrate on protecting the vital parts of our war-making capacity, our harbors, feeding points, power stations, munitions factories and mobilization centers."

Sir Archibald Sinclair, Liberal leader, expressed suspicion that neither anti-aircraft guns nor balloons for anti-aircraft barrage were of the highest grade and charged that organization of air-raid precautions was still the Cinderella of the defense program.

Sir Arthur Salter, speaking with the authority of Controller of Interallied Shipping during the World War, demanded that the problem of food storage receive priority in the Government's plans so that the navy should be relieved of terrific convoying tasks in wartime.

Sir Thomas Inskip gave his critics little satisfaction, but asserted supply problems were so fully solved by now that he was turning to broader questions of strategy. Anti-aircraft equipment is now being produced in large quantities, he declared, and by early Autumn it would be possible to appeal for a full complement of recruits for this all-important field of defense.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

"Nor Custom Staled"

The children, aged four and five were being put to bed. "We do love you, mummy," said the younger one, hugging her.

"Why do you love me, darling?"

"'Cos we like your face."

"But it isn't much of a face," said mother.

That was a bit of a poser. The boy thought a moment. "But we've got used to it," he said.

Journalist Faces Trial In Valencia

N. Y. Times

LONDON, July 31.—A different light on the outbreak of last May in Barcelona and the suppression of the P. O. U. M. which was reported to have resulted in the death of 600 and the wounding of 1,400 was thrown by Fenner Brockway, general secretary of the British independent labor party, in a statement he issued here today in connection with the arrest of J. M. Escuder, newspapermen well known in New York.

Mr. Brockway has just returned from Spain where he went with a group of British and French Laborites to investigate the suppression of the P. O. U. M. The P. O. U. M., anti-Stalinist Communists, was in opposition to the Loyalist Cabinet in Spain. Its suppression was an incident of the disorders. One of those arrested was Robert Smiley, grandson of the famous British labor leader. According to reports here, Mr. Smiley died in prison after having been refused treatment for an appendicitis attack.

Mr. Brockway said former Premier Francisco Largo Caballero had told him one of the reasons why he was forced out of office by the Communists was because he refused to suppress the P. O. U. M. and that the Communists arrested the P. O. U. M. leaders without the knowledge of the government. His statement follows in full:

"J. M. Escuder was arrested six weeks ago because of his connection with the Battlla, a daily newspaper published by the P. O. U. M. All the forty members of the P. O. U. M. executive, together with many of its local officials, were arrested.

Communists Made Charges

"The Communist party made charges against them of acting as agents of General Franco and the Fascists and demanded they be tried by military tribunals and that the death penalty should be imposed.

"The P. O. U. M. is the brother party in Spain of the British Indepenent Labor party and I went to Spain to inquire into its position.

I found that the arrests of P. O. U. M. leaders and members had been carried out by the Communist-controlled secret police and that, in many cases, members of the Government were unaware of what had been done.

"In the case of Escuder, for instance, he and four of the P. O. U. M. leaders were transferred from Barcelona to Madrid without the knowledge of the Minister of the Interior. When I approached the Minister of the Interior in the matter, he left for Madrid to find out what the situation was. He assured me Escuder and the other prisoners were living—there had been rumors of their deaths—and promised they would be brought to Valencia immediately.

"I have since heard that Escuder is now confined in a Valencia prison, where he will be a great deal safer than in Madrid.

"I found that, in all circles outside the Communist party, there was strong opposition to the arrests and disbelief in the Communist party charges. All non-Communist members of the Catalonian Government, including President Luis Companys, had protested to the Valencia Government. Non-Communist members of the Valencia Government dissociated themselves from the Communist charges and stated that the trial would be limited to two charges: (1) That Fascists had succeeded in introducing certain agents provocateurs into the P. O. U. M. and (2) that the P. O. U. M. had incited the resistance in Barcelona during the May days and had encouraged workers to refuse to surrender their arms. It will undoubtedly be on the latter charge that Escuder will be tried. No one would suggest he is a Fascist spy.

Wife an American Citizen

"Escuder will be defended by Senor Benito Pabon, member of the Cortes for Saragossa. He is one of the best known lawyers in Spain.

"I found there was disbelief in the Communist charges among other sections of the working class, and particularly in the C. N. T. (Syndicalist Trade Union), which is the largest working class organization in Spain and in the non-Communist section of the U. G. T. (Socialist Trade Union).

"Largo Caballero, secretary of the U. G. T., told me one of the reasons why Communists had driven him out of the Premiership was his refusal to arrest P. O. U. M. leaders, including Escuder.

"Mrs. Escuder who is an American citizen, has left Spain for Paris, where she is hoping to organize international agitation and demand justice for her husband and other P. O. U. M. members.

"Very influential pressure is being exerted from all countries and is significant. Senor Negrin, Prime Minister, in replying to these protests, emphasizes the Government is not responsible for what's been done and that the action has been taken by the police. He promises a fair trial. I could not ascertain the date of the trial, but was assured it would not be delayed unduly"

Authors Protest Arrest

The arrest of Joseph M. Escuder has been protested to the Spanish Government by such well-known figures as Norman Thomas, Socialist candidate for President of the United States, and Diego Rivera, the Mexican painter.

Joining in the protest were Authors John Dos Passos, James T. Farrell, James Rorty, Bertram Wolfe and Anita Brenner and the radical leader, Jay Lovestone.

Miss Brenner said that "the protests were occasioned by a belief, which still continues, that the arrest of Escuder indicated Russia was exporting to Spain, not only food and arms, but its system of elaborately cooked-up trials and bloody finales for political rivalries." She added that the statement by Mr. Brockway that the arrests were carried out without the knowledge of the Government confirmed her belief.

Senor Escuder came to New York from Barcelona in 1928 to do newspaper work. He began on La Prensa, Spanish language newspaper, was American correspondent for Spanish newspapers and then became Latin-American editor of the North American Newspaper Alliance. He went back to Spain in 1934 and in 1936, shortly before the outbreak of the civil war, arrived here to join the advertising department of the Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation.

He was called back to Spain in the Fall of that year to take a post with the Government, but while he was en route the Cabinet was changed and his party retired.

In New York, he married America Gonzales of Tampa, Fla., who taught at Barnard College.

Amusing Mistakes That Appeared In American Papers

Editor & Publisher

About three years ago J. C. Penney was touring cities in the South in which he had stores, among them West Point, Miss. Paul R. Bumbarger, then managing editor of the West Point Times Leader, who is now with the AP, went to Mr. Penney's hotel room with Stanley Fink, now a Toledo News-Bee copy reader, prior to a joint Kiwanis-Rotary club luncheon. During an interview he asked if they cared to have a copy of the speech he was to deliver at the luncheon. Upon getting an affirmative reply he went to a table and took several pages from a stack of papers and handed them out.

Too Late

Bumbarger returned to the office to write up the speech while Fink covered the remaining part of the program. When the paper came off the press and had been sent out for delivery, Fink read the story which was played up as a streamer. Mr. Penney's speech in the paper was his life story and now he had built up his retail chain . . . while his speech at the luncheon concerned a review of business conditions in the United States and the future business outlook. But it was too late to do anything about it.

Thirty minutes later Mr. Penney phoned and said he regretted his error in giving the Times Leader the wrong speech, one which he intended giving in Meridian, Miss., the next day. He said he didn't have his glasses on and took the wrong speech from his stack of prepared talks.

Only criticism the write-up received, although nearly 100 of the city's leading citizens attended the luncheon, came from a Baptist pastor who said he thought the paper had missed the main point of Mr. Penney's talk!

Cub's Story

Al Bergener, former city editor of the Cleveland News, sent a cub out to get a story about a colorful Polish wedding. The cub came back, wrote a column and turned it in. Bergener threw it back without looking at it. "Cut it," he said. Soon the reporter handed it in again. Bergener this time ventured a glance. Then he threw it back and said again "cut it."

Once more the reporter wrestled with the story and once more turned it in to Bergener. It had shrunk by this time from 1,200 words to 250. Bergener again took a look. "Cut it," he snapped and tossed it back. This time the cub went back to his typewriter and rewrote. He turned his story in once more. It read:

"There was a Polish wedding at 66666 Broadway last night. Those in the hospital are—"

Ross Murphy, one-time city editor of the Memphis Press-Scimitar, had a reporter who was eternally quoting Shakespeare. Murphy instructed, coaxed, threatened and pleaded, but the vagrant line from "Twelfth Night" "Hamlet" "King Lear" and the rest were eternally showing up. One day Murphy issued an ultimatum. It meant nothing for within 24 hours the reporter turned in a railroad rate hearing story in which he had without any conceivable motivation inserted a line from "Julius Caesar." Murphy wrote a slip for the cashier and called the stubborn Shakespearian to his desk.

"Listen" said Murphy, "the ides of March are come and you are gone."

A village correspondent sent the following item with her weekly grist of news:

"An eight-pound baby girl was born to Miss Boxie Graleigh last Tuesday. Congratulations."

Through hasty editing the paragraph was printed just that way and it was one of those slips that couldn't be blamed on the compositor. The editor learned, to his dismay, that Miss Graleigh was a very nice girl up to the time she made her great mistake and was an object of sympathy rather than congratulation.

Scoop Made

When Frederick Essary, now Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sunpapers, was city editor, a cocky cub joined the staff who needed a bit of chastising. The gang cooked up a likely tale, and the cub was called to the desk for an assignment.

"Here, take this paper, and get out to——street. There's been a suicide. Quite an important man. Get all the dope."

Eagerly, the cub grabbed the paper and slammed out of the city room. The name on the paper—the name of the "suicide"—was "O. B. Thotful."

An hour later the cub came back, and began to pound his typewriter, Essary kept a straight face. If the fellow had discovered the ruse and was trying to write a story anyway, he'd play the game out. In silence, the city editor received the story. Immediately into the waste basket it went. He wasn't going to give the cub the satisfaction of reading the piece.

That night, when Essary left the office, the opposition newspaper had plastered on the front page the suicide of one of the town's leading citizens. Essary's paper hadn't carried a line on it.

On hands and knees Essary searched through the wastebasket next to his desk. Sure enough, there was the suicide story he had been scooped on, written by the cub!

The cub had gone to the address he was given, and had knocked on the door. Nobody answered. Presistent pounding caused a neighbor in the apartment upstairs to stick his head out of the window and shout, "There's no suicide here." So the cub had gone away disappointed. On the corner he met a policeman and told him there's been a suicide and he had to get in to get the story.

"The suicide's not there, but a couple of doors away," the cop said. And the cub got the story.

Mistakes by rural correspondents are not unusual among the Erie Daily Times staff, but some approach the ridiculous. One in particular, whose blunders were offset by his ability to seize on a spot story and cover it thoroughly to the end, came up with this masterpiece:

"Joseph P——, well-known local resident, had the misfortune to fall last Tuesday and break his right wrist below the elbow."

Neutrality Law Use Called War Threat To U.S.

N. Y. Herald Tribune

WASHINGTON, July 31—Senator J. Hamilton Lewis, Democrat, of Illinois, said today that the United States could be at war with China or Japan or both "within an hour" if it complied with demands for immediate enforcement of the neutrality law.

Discussing the Administration's policy with regard to the Asiatic crisis, Senator Lewis told the Senate:

"Those who are demanding that the United States enforce its neutrality law at once fail to see that the moment we announce either one of the nations as the aggressor, and declare both as being at war, our ships of trade delivering American goods in the Orient would at once be seized by either China or Japan, or both, as bringing supplies to the enemy.

"The American citizens would be seized and imprisoned, and then it is that America must go to the rescue of her people and her property, and this she must do by her American Navy, and America becomes at once involved in the war of China and Japan.

"At present the American shipper can continue sending his goods to China and Japan, and unless they are munitions of war deliberately sent for the purpose of aiding the conflict, neither country has a grievance against America.

"But, when once America attempts to apply her neutrality law, and stops her merchants from disposing of American goods to China or Janan, the vessels of the Americans who are already on the seas for the purpose of delivering material—unconscious that they are violating any law—could be seized or fired upon, and America at once would be forced to resent these assaults, and America would be at war with the Orient.

"For this reason—to avoid such possibility—the President must continue his efforts to persuade those in conflict, both in Spain and in the Orient, to come to peace upon acceptable terms, and keep the United States from embroiling itself through its merchants and shippers being seized as offenders, and thus the United States be deprived of all influence in its efforts to mediate through good counsel and restore the conflicting forces to peace and good will of neighbors."

Shortly after Senator Lewis spoke, the While House announced that Secretary and Mrs. Cordell Hull would join President Roosevelt and his party aboard the Presidential yacht, Potomac, tomorrow morning if the Secretary of State was able to leave Washington at that time. Tentative plans have been made for them to board the Potomac at Quantico, Va., where the President will stop to deliver a radio address to France on the occasion of the dedication of the American World War battle monument as Montfaucon.

The Secretary of State said today that he was prepared to report by radiophone to the President any new developments in the Far Eastern crisis. Secretary Hull told his press conference, however, that the situation in North China had appeared to be relatively quiet.

The American Embassy at Peiping reported to the State Department that it had received information that Harry S. Martin, of Boston, and James A. Hunter, of Peoria, Ill., were alive and well at noon yesterday at Tungchow. Some concern over the welfare of the two Americans, engaged in missionary work, had been expressed because of failure to hear from them directly. Chinese refugees from Tungchow reported that some slight damage was done to two buildings at the American mission at Tungchow.

LZ-130 Near Completion; Will Employ Helium

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

FRIEDRICHSHAFEN, Aug. 25—With every indication that the United States will supply the Zeppelin Company with helium gas for its airships, the construction of the LZ-130, said to be more commodious and safer than the Hindenburg, which exploded at Lakehurst last May, is being rushed at top speed. The giant zeppelin is expected to be completed by the early part of next month and will be fitted with helium gas compartments, it was announced.

Officials of the Zeppelin Company today discussed the possibilities of using helium on the new ship. At least 200,000 cubic centimeters of gas will be needed to fill the giant air liner. The gas, whose sale is expected to be announced by the American Government shortly, will be transported here in huge steel bottles.

Nazis Can't Be Rotarians, Ordains Berlin Decree

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

BERLIN, Aug. 24—If they wish to remain party members in good standing, all Nazis will henceforth have to refrain from joining Rotary Clubs, according to a new decree promulgated by the Hitler Government today. Authoritative quarters said the action was taken because membership in such clubs with international connections might involve a conflict with "duties to the Fatherland."

Italy To Send More Troops To China

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

ROME, Aug. 25—Following the action taken by British, American and French military authorities, the Italian government will despatch a large number of troops to reinforce the Italian garrisons in China, it was officially announced today. The troops to be sent are presently stationed at Ethiopia, but will leave shortly for the Far East from Massawa.

Liberty Symbolized

The American monument at Montfaucon is a large, Doric column surmounted by a figure symbolic of liberty.

Across the front of the monument are inscribed the names of the four most important areas—from a military viewpoint—in the territory captured by American troops. The divisions which comprised the First Army are listed on the wall around the main terrace. Inside the entrance a small vestibule, decorated with American and French flags, leads into the base of the shaft. Carved on the walls of the vestibule are a brief description in French and English of American operations, a colored map illustrating the American offensive in the region and a tribute by General Pershing to his soldiers.

KARUIZAWA NOTES

The last contract bridge game of the season held at the Mampei Hotel proved a great success. The elite of Karuizawa was well represented, including a distinguished guest at the hotel, the Marquis Molinari d'Incisa who took part in the games. On account of the large number of players present, four prizes were given to the winners and the runners-up. These games have lately become so popular that a request has been made to have them continued in Tokyo. Mrs. L. M. Wilkinson, sponsor of these contract bridge games, has consented to arrange games this autumn, the time and place to be announced later.

NOJIRI NOTES

As the summer draws to a close all community sports are nearly finished. The younger members have been able to show their athletic abilities in swimming meets, tennis tournaments, baseball and volleyball. In the same way the older folks have been very busy playing golf matches, sailing in the races, and improving their style on the tennis courts.

On Monday August 23, the Nojiri Annual Swimming Meet was held. In this meet two of the most important races were run. The Mary Woodsworth Cup Race and the Simms Cup race. The Mary Woodsworth race is a race for girls who swim 50 meters free-style. The winner of this race was Elaine Healy, aged 15, second was Margaret Mickle and third Elly Robinson. The Simms Cup race is a 100 meter free-style race for boys. The winner of this was Erik Thorlaksson, second was Stuart Robinson and third Ralf Felton. Erik Thorlaksson swam a very fast race, arriving at the finish with the record time of 68 seconds. After these were finished, races were run for those who did not want to compete for cups.

Ralf Felton the Life Guard has been having a very busy time teaching beginners how to win their "N's." To win a Nojiri "N" one must know various holds for life saving and know how to handle a boat correctly and many other very useful things that help one become an experienced swimmer.

On Tuesday and Wednesday the Men's and Ladies Pentathlon races were held. The events for this annual aquatic meet are, 50 meter backstroke, crawlstroke, and breaststroke, the boathouse swim, and fancy diving. The winners are chosen from those scoring the highest number of points in every race or event. The winner of the Men's Pentathlon was Erik Thorlaksson, second was Harvel Daniels and third Stuart Robinson. Erik Thorlaksson again swam a very good race but his diving was comparatively poor. The pentathlon marked the end of all Nojiri swimming meets and Ralf Felton the Life Guard who is always on duty in the mornings, resigns his post on Saturday.

On Friday the water festival, which had been postponed because of unfavorable weather conditions, was ruined again because of a violent thunder storm which blew up just as the lighted torches were being set out on the lake. Nojiri has been having a great many of these thunder storms but on the whole the weather has been very favorable.

On Sunday Mr. Throop was in charge of the morning service and the Rev. W. J. M. Craig gave the sermon. On Sunday night a Sacred Concert was held in the auditorium. The community choir, which is composed of a large group of community singers gave several delightful items and solos were given by Miss Lydie and Mr. P. Buchanan.

There have been several parties given during last week. June Buchanan gave one on Monday, which was attended by a large group of the younger members of the community. On Tuesday evening a community party was given for the boys and girls of high school ages. The party was held in the boat-house.

There have been several Current Event meeting this year. This week Mr. C. Iglehart gave a very interesting speech on Japan. The speech was especially interesting to those who are visiting Japan from China. After each speech is made the subject is open to discussion. These meetings, which are under the supervision of Mr. Covell, are very interesting and are very good for the juniors who go to them.

The Juniors are also having quite a few picnics and parties. On Wednesday night there was a junior party at the Down's house.

Dean Terry, son of Mr. D. S. Terry, brought a diving helmet and pump from Kobe and several of the younger members of the community have been having a great deal of fun from using it. On Thursday morning Dean brought his diving apparatus to the raft at the swimming pavilion. He and several of the boys went down to a depth of 30 feet of water and hunted for clams. Several articles which have been lost in the lake have been found with the use of this diving apparatus. All those members of the community who have used it enjoyed very much the new experience of walking on the floor of the lake! Dean Terry has also got new and more powerful motor for his speed-boat "Mo-Ga," which hitherto has been unable to run because of lack of power. He is intending to leave Nojiri and go to America on Friday. He has been in college in America for one year, before which he was a student in the Canadian Academy.

On Thursday morning Helen Durgin, aged 15, swam from Nojiri village to the community swimming pavilion, a distance of nearly 3 miles. This swim from the village is a favorite one with most young Nojiriites. The record for it was set by Sherwood Moran, who covered the distance in 1 hour and 6 minutes.

The results of all the sailing races and golf matches will be announced on "Stunt" night which is to be held in the auditorium on Friday night. Stunt night is a night when all residents who feel the urge to go upon the stage and make fools of themselves are perfectly welcome to do so! It is a night of rejoicing and it is also an informal way of more or less closing the season. On this night also, the prizes for races won and tournaments won are awarded to the lucky ones.

Donald Moran, aged 17, is leaving Nojiri for America on Friday. Donald has lived in Japan most of his life and was a student at Canadian Academy. He is intending to go to college in California.

Battalion Service Fits South African Youths For Jobs

Christian Science Monitor

DURBAN, S. Africa—By far the most successful of the several social schemes undertaken by the present Government of South Africa is the formation of Special Service Battalions composed of boys who are unable to find employment immediately after leaving school.

At its inception about three years ago, the scheme aroused the hostility of those who saw in it only one step toward militarization of the nation on the fascist or national socialist plan. Oswald Pirow, Minister of of Railways and Defense, who sponsored the formation of these battalions, went on undeterred, until today the success of his enterprise is acknowledged.

Mr. Pirow saw the position from a different angle from that of his critics. He saw hundreds of youths as the result of the depression lounging at street corners, steadily losing their self-respect and self-reliance under the influence of idleness, and rapidly qualifying for careers as were wasters and hangers-on in the community. He knew that the time was coming when there would be work available for these boys if they were still fit for the work, and through the service battalions he gave them that opportunity.

Kept Fit for Work

The result is indicated in figures issued recently concerning one battalion, which showed that of 1325 boys for whom employment was found in 12 months no fewer than 1236 were in their original employment a year later and giving satisfaction. In many cases glowing reports were given by employers.

Altogether, since the battalions were formed, 6094 men have passed through their ranks. Of these, 5350 through the Battalion employment bureau, 2243 going to the services of the Railways and Harbors Administration, 1383 to the Permanent Defense Force establishments and the others to the police, and to catering, mining, motoring industries, etc.

The lads enrolled under the scheme have all gained from the experience. The improvement of those passing through the ranks of the battalions is seen to be due in no small measure to the welfare work which is associated with discipline, physical training nad well-selected food.

Militaristic Measure

While approximately 700 young and disciplined men have passed through the Service Battalions on to the Defense Force Reserve, the units have always stopped short of being real infantry training units No portion of the time of service has hitherto been spent in field exercises, and no provision exists by which the men who served in the battalions and who are now on the reserve can be called up annually to round off their parade ground experience with tactical training.

Every boy in the Special Service Battalions is given some vocational training and a job found for him on his discharge.

This scheme is now expected to take its place as a permanent feature of the social structure of South Africa.

Bolivian Coup Seen As Return To Democracy

Christian Science Monitor

LA PAZ, Bolivia—A complete outsider with no knowledge of Bolivian affairs could detect between the lines of official statements that the latest revolution in the "roof of the Andes" republic means a triumph for the more orderly and constitutionally-minded citizens. But in any event, the new ruler, Col. German Busch, has made it clear that communism, the threat of which has been hovering over Bolivia for some time, will not be tolerated and that the army will evacuate politics and restore civilians to power through popular elections.

Such promises, of course, have been made by successful revolutionaries before and have not been kept; though all who have a personal knowledge of Colonel Busch and his associates are convinced of the new junta's sincerity.

The early acts of the new government tend to confirm this sincerity of purpose. For the first time in five years Bolivians are free of censorship—press and mails—while a fairly general political amnesty has been conceded. Abolished newspapers and parties have sprung to life again, business has been given a new tone of confidence, and election prepared. The date of these is expected to be announced soon.

The most significant act was to invite and secure civilian representation in the junta. Chile, with more at stake than other American powers, was immediately relieved by the announcement that the new government would respect all treaty obligations, while the neutral powers in the Chaco peace conference at Buenos Aires were cheered by the pledge of wholehearted cooperation to write "finis" to that dispute.

A Bloodless Revolution

As to the revolution itself, it was bloodless. It was all over in two hours and was laconically termed a "change of government." When the President, Col. David Toro, returned from a week's vacation at Hurmiri, he was met at the federal capital by a detachment from the army, led by Gen. Enrique Penaranda, Chaco war commander-in-chief, and Colonel Busch, chief of the general staff, who demanded his resignation. A lengthy consultation followed in which the military leaders pointed out he would be well advised to resign in the interest of the peace of the country, especially since they had the solid support of the army.

Colonel Toro shortly afterward presented his resignation, and the presidency was immediately taken over by Busch. Colonel Toro, who left the next day for the Chilean port of Arica, claimed that he was treated "violently" and thrust across the frontier as an exile. If this is correct, he joins two former presidents in Chilean exile, Hernando Siles and Saavedra Bautista, though the former has been restored to favor with the ambassadorship in Santiago. A more likely report is that Colonel Toro may be reconciled by the award of a foreign mission which, with the recent recovery in tin, Bolivian can well afford for the sake of domestic peace.

The new President, Col. German Busch, is the youngest colonel in the Bolivian army. He is only 32. He entered the Chaco campaign as a captain and after distinguishing himself in service was elevated to the rank of colonel. He has since been made captain-general of the army, pledged to carry out the new program. His name suggests, but his physical appearance denies, German ancestry. However, Colonel Busch claims that he is no candidate for personal publicity, as it is the fixed determination of the army today to be nothing more than a bridge for the return to constitutional normality.

It was a case of youth in the lead, solidly backed by experience. General Penaranda, the Chaco war commander-in-chief, represented all the conservative elements in military and civic life which had been disturbed by the trends of socialism and irresponsibility among the younger army elements surrounding Colonel Toro. There had been too much loose talk about imposing socialism by the sword. A "purification" movement generated in the Chaco war disillusionment had degenerated into an irresponsible alliance with militant labor. A State Socialistic party was created to perpetuate this alliance, with the exclusion of all other legitimate influence in government. Chaotic industrial and social relations crees.

"Dictatorship is an open denial of democracy," Salgado said. "We do not want to implant a dictatorship, but neither will we tolerate the twenty-two dictatorships now existing in Brazil, threatening democracy, absorbing municipal autonomies, nullifying the federal legislature, coercing the powers of justice and placing impositions on the federal administration."

With most of the organized political forces of the country against him, and his party banned in one state, Salgado believes he stands a fair chance of being elected President of Brazil.

"We are ready to defend ourselves," he warned.

A Shanghai Refugee

the arena of activities. Frightened Chinese servants were informing the management that they were leaving but they clamored for their wages. The manager, a Swiss, frantically tried to explain that he had no funds to pay them off and he himself made for flight. He threw up his hands in despair; the Hotel was too near the Consulate to be safe! A group of American students led by Prof. Reifschaur checked out with all speed. They all made hasty retreats across the Garden Bridge over to the safety of the Palace Hotel. After the confusion and air raid was over daughter and I flopped into chairs and looked about us to see how many of us could be salvaged from the ordeal. Out of the 200 guests we discovered that we were seven, we the only two women, 4 faithful Chinese boys, the cook, the head dining room steward, two office clerks and the head porter, all foreign. The steward was at the helm.

Just as we were gaining a bit of composure and thought we could stand nothing more one of the guests who had fled ten minutes before, white, dishevelled, an arm hasily bandaged, came hobbling in with a story that nearly paralized our nerve-wrecked bodies. One of the fleeing Chinese planes had dropped a bomb three stories through the Palace Hotel. It and the Cathay Hotel and Nanking Road was a scene of horror where hundreds lay mutilated and dying Resentment burned in the eyes of this German. The settlement even was not safe. At that time little did we know that there was a more terrific, more ghastly scene down on the French concession border. At this moment another guest rushed in. He too had seen the horrors of war; we could see it in his face. He had been an eye witness to the brutal killing of two Japanese civilians who had been set upon by the hating, viscious crowd, and by whom they had been ground to pulp. The Bund that day, usually so peaceful and vital with pulsating life, bore the scars of China's own doing.

The steward, now elevated to Manager soon after told us that the cook would prepare some food and those of us sat around at hastily prepared tables, help with guests. We were no respector of persons. The Hotel was in complete darkness except for a few candles which reflected grotesque figures which danced and played upon the walls. Our faithful room coolie heroically tried his best to carry on in commendable fashion in the temporary position of waiter. The table talk consisted of forebodings and assurances, speculations on the safety of the settlement and our Hotel in particular, and the ghastly events of the day.

Another guest, a Japanese, and we decided to change our rooms to the third floor in case of more raids. So we climbed two flights of stairs in the blackness of night, in a huge hotel while typhoon winds howled without, banging wooden shutters like through report of pistol shots, the frequent reports of guns from snipers and the rear of cannons in the distance. We felt that death did indeed lurk around the corner for all of us. About an hour after we had retired we heard running in the hall and a loud knock at our door. The porter, frightened himself, told us that someone had brought news that the Chinese army was breaking through. Now everyone had left except the two night clerks and himself. Would we flee or stay. We chose to stay.

It seemed that night never was so long nor a wind so fierce. Long hours had we in which to reflect upon a fate that would a second time thrust us into the midst of a conflict with my country and that which had been my home for seven years and with a people among whom we had many friends. Three times that night daughter and I felt our way down the stairs in the dark down to the lobby. With the stoicism of his race my husband would not be disturbed from his sleep. Down in the lobby was a band of eight Volunteers, three Chinese, and mixed foreigners sent to keep the Hotel from being looted. Some of them slept the sleep of utter exhaustion. Six valiant Japanese marines guarded the Garden Bridge and two stood guard at our hotel corner. To talk to them gave us courage. Three lay under the eaves of the Hotel utterly exhausted after forty eight hours vigilance, their comrades told us. One youthful brave told us that he had only arrived the morning before and knew nothing of the location of the city or Chinese tactics. They were soaked to the skin, cold and hungry but smiling and courageous. We made sandwiches for them and gave them smokes. They accepted them with an eagerness that was pathetic.

Thus the night dragged on and with the coming of dawn the whurr of the airplanes made me pale. But they flew low so we knew they were Japanese seaplanes. Bravely the one from the Japanese flagship took off in the strong wind to the Hunjao airdrome. In no time she returned, loaded bombs, took off again and in some thirty minutes returned, it was said after a successful trip. This day saw two more air raids by the Chinese. In the afternoon one of the bombs fell in the Whangpoo on the other side of Garden Bridge from the Consulate.

In spite of the repeated assurances by my husband that the Astor House Hotel was one of the safest places I was of different mind because of its proximity to the two vital points of attack, the Consulate and the flagship, and because the Chinese soldiers must pass by it if they once broke into the settlement as all other roads were closed. So daughter and I spent that night at the official residence of the Japanese Consul-General in the heart of the international concession. On our way there we drove through the streets where the tragedies of the day before had been enacted. It was not exaggerated. The evidence even after twenty-four hours was horribly convincing. The Palace windows had all been blown out and were boarded up. Broken glass was everywhere. Wreckage of motor cars and other debris was strewn everywhere. At the New World center in Frenchtown I could imagine what an appalling catastrophe it had been. The streets swarming with refugees filling sidewalks and entrances to shops gazing up at the pride of their nation. These planes and their army would bring victory to them over the enemy. They were cheering, clapping and rejoicing, when down in their midst hurtled that awful thing killing them instead, a thousand or more. There is always a traffic jam at corners in all the blocks of that area. Rows of crumpled wrenched and burnt cars from which no human could ever have escaped. Probably it will be many a day before all the victims will be identified if at all. Among the victims were foreign friends of ours. Two or three miles further into the settlement shrapnel from this bomb found its victims. Even had a strong wind miscarried the bomb hitting the Palace, it would be ridiculous to account for this last atrocity in any such manner as the affected area is several miles away from the Consulate and the Japanese flagship, the seat of attack.

The flesh is weak and sleep does come even to the most distraught. That night while away from the horrors of the day where the sounds of the cannons sounded less near, the wives of the Legation and consul staff who still remained in Shanghai with their children, guarded by a few of the younger staff found some few hours of restless sleep. That night was unusually quiet although Chinese soldiers tried to rush the settlement but were repulsed by the British guarding that sector. In fact it would seem that both sides must be contemplating some strategic move the next day. How glad we were that another night had passed but how we dreaded the new day and what it might bring. On this morning a British friend told though of Japanese blood sought refuge on a British gunboat. Word came that daughter and I would be saved passage on the Rakuyo Maru and to board at ten. The white Russian chauffeur of a friend of our came post haste and drove us to the N.Y.K. office to secure our tickets. There we were treated to another air raid and between roaring guns we rushed to the Astor house grabbed a few pieces of hand baggage and began one of the saddest rides we shall ever have. We passed through one of the most dangerous sections where the day before planted Chinese trench mortars had fired on a rescue vanguard of the S.M.C. evacuating a hospital and killed eleven Chinese and one foreigner, and which within the next half hour, saw more death and destruction from a Chinese bomb.

Together with 1500 refugees, composed motive of the wives and children of workers in spinning factories, we were herded onto the boat packed like sar dines. The Rakuyo Maru from Hongkong Japan bound had turned back from the high seas to render this service for humanity. Once on the boat a wave of bitter grief assailed me. I was fleeing from danger but I was leaving my all in the most dangerous of places, the Consulate. I knew not whether we should ever meet again, for the Government bodies are the last to leave the points of danger. As one of the high officials said they must look upon themselves in the same spirit of the Japanese soldier—duty toward their country to the bitter end and we, the wives as soldier's wives.

Just as my husband waved a courageous 'good-bye' one of the worst air raids occurred. Not far from the boat two Chinese airplanes were brought down in flames. But the feverish loading of refugees continued, the old and the maimed, brought on stretches, confused and haggard women, and children not knowing whether this was a lark or what. Brave men of all walks of life acting as emergency volunteers with pistols in hulsters and bands on their arms rendering assistance wherever they could. Husbands bringing their families and hastily returning to their various duties. At one o'clock, schedule time the boat with great difficulty set sail as the towing company would not work. Amid the roar of guns, with no one to see us off.

There was a great deal of concern as boats leaving previously bearing refugees had been fired upon at Woosung. Consequently we steamed slowly up the river. Moreover, because the gunboats on the river were firing on the Chinese lines in Kiangwan which resulted in huge clouds of smoke all along the back of the Chinese Civic Center. The Chinese on previous days had claimed that they had destroyed the Kung Pah Cotton Mills of 1932 fame, and that the Japanese had destroyed Shanghai University and Yangtzepoo. I took particular pains to note these above places only to learn that these had only been part of the many wild rumors circulated to encourage the Chinese and to undermine the morale of the Japanese, and to impress foreign countries.

As we neared Woosung much of the same feeling of the last few days returned—fifteen minutes of agonizing waiting, praying for the best but fearing the worst. But I should have known better. Cannon balls came from the Pootung side—five of them. One hit the land, mowed up a mountain of flying dirt, and the four others skimmed the water falling some 500 feet from the boat. Woosung was safely passed but flying towards us came a squadron of airplanes! From one of the gunboats that we were passing we saw the Japanese sailors scuttling to their anti-air craft guns aiming them at the approaching planes. Again my heart lost a beat, only to be found again when the Captain reassured us that they were Japanese planes probably returning to their headquarters after a days work. Once out on the high seas, 'safe at last, the harbor past' but all the heartaches for all we had left behind of fear, hate misery suffering and destruction.

It would seem that life is full of events even on a rescue boat. Before our boat reached Nagasaki a baby girl was born, and they named her for the boat. Death also followed in our wake. A young son of Nippon was killed as he fell down the hatch. Some fifteen persons were taken off the boat at Nagasaki on stretchers, being ill from the horrors they had gone through. As death stalked our path so did our boat bring its war heroes, as this was the second time the Captain had made a rescue of refugees. The other hero was Mr. Uchiyama an old resident of Shanghai and much beloved by Shanghai Japanese for his unselfish sacrifices for the good of his fellow countrymen there. He is acting as leader for as many boat loads of refugees as he can. Many of the women are helpless. Mr. Uchiyama is attending to all of the details of landing and travel for them. He probably will lose everything he possesses in worldly goods but he smiles with that cheerfulness and stoicism peculiar to his race and says "Shikataganai".

Before the writer closes she would just like to mention the wonderful courage being displayed in Shanghai by many men. Japanese civilians who have lived there a long time and know the language are doing active and long hour service with the marines accompanying them at all dangerous quarters usually uniformed. Others are helping the local Residents Association for the safety and comfort of civilians and soldiers. They are even providing rations to the starving Chinese refugees.

Along the front line of heroes are the newspaper men. They risk every kind of danger to give us news and to do their bit for the Japanese forces. And last but not least are those who are remaining to protect the interests of those by whom they are employed.

Lastly, the writer feels moved to mention the noble work being carried on at the points of disembarkation of refugees. The work of these volunteer workers is efficient and humane. They make these poor unnerved refugees feel that they are indeed glad to have left all the horrors of war behind and that they have founda helping and sympathetic hand awaiting them.

Italy's Colonies Parade On Stamps

By COLLECTOR

In extra large, but artistically designed, stamps Italy now shows her African possessions to the world. Ostensibly commemorating the Second Colonial Arts Exhibition, these stamps also serve to remind Italians of the spread of the new Roman Empire.

Largest of the colonies represented on the stamps is Tripolitania—which is more than three times as large as Italy. Most of Tripolitania is desert land, and huge and shifting sand dunes are found through the desert, over which the transport planes of the air service fly regularly. One of the stamps show a caravan, with three Arabs on their camels.

In the borders of the stamps are illustrated the old Roman symbol of the fasces, or bundles of fagots, which are considered to symbolize strength through unity. Each fagot alone is weak; bound together they are strong. These fasces appear on the United States ten cent piece over the motto "E Pluribus Unum". One Out of Many'—and it is from the same idea that the word "fascism" is derived. When Mussolini founded the Fascists in 1919 he adopted the fasces as the emblem of his party.

Tripolitania and its easter neighbor Cyrenaica, taken by Italy after the war with Turkey in 1912, are jointly referred to as Libya, the old Roman name for the territory.

In Cyrenaica many artistic treasures left by a civilization which inhabited the country thousands of years ago, have been unearthed. One of the most lovely of these is the beautiful statue of the Venus of Cirene, illustrated on three of the airmail stamps. The Venus of Cirene was discovered in 1913, after a heavy rainstorm had washed away the soil which had protected it for centuries.

Along the southernmost end of the Red Sea lies Eritrea, most populous of the colonies. Eritrea contains many miles of desert, and on this airmail stamp we see a camel contrasted with an airplane overhead. The airplane enables Italy to keep in close touch with her colonies and to reach places which were here tofore inaccessible.

Most valuable to Italy is the colony of Italian Somaliland, which extends along the Indian Ocean for a thousand miles. Most of the natives of Somaliland are a mixture of negro and Arab. They are tall, robust, possessing strong physiques. A native woman is shown on this stamp. Dressed in the colorful robes of her tribe, she carries her infant on her back.

Italian Somaliland's value lies in the fact that it abounds with rich and fertile soil which is well suited to agriculture. Because of the oppressive heat, however, the natives prefer to deal in dressed skins, cattle, frankincense, and myrrh. In recent years, however, Italian farmers have come into the land and are gradually converting the rich jungle land into profitale farms where they raise cotton, sugar cane, rice, maize and such products which are scarce in Italy.

"Jamestown Mystery"

Although the sources of most of the pictures used in designing the United States stamps are known to philatelists, collectors and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing have failed to solve the "Jamestown mystery." Ever since the two-cent denomination of the Jamestown set, showing the founding of Jamestown, was issued in 1907, it has been impossible to uncover the picture upon which the stamp design was based.

The portrait of Captain John Smith, which the Bureau of Engraving and Printing copied on the one cent stamp, is listed by Hill and Johl as "Engraved by [illegible] Pass after a drawing by Robert Clark. From the sixth state of the map in 1627 edition of Generall Historie by Captain John Smith, from a copy in the Boston Public Library." The Portrait of Pocohontas was by the same engraver in a 1624 edition of the 'General Historie.'

But the source of the picture "The Founding of Jamestown" seems to have been lost. An exhaustive search by philatelists has failed to locate the original, nor is the name of the artist known. That the picture was furnished the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by the Jamestown Exposition Company is all that has been revealed. Whether it was an advertising poster or a more finely executed canvas, collectors have never been able to learn.

Ecuador has issued six new sets of stamps and two varieties of semi-postals. One of these honors the United States Constitution sesquicentennial celebration. On July 4th a regular postage set showing the flag and coat-of-arms of Ecuador, was issued. With this were air-mail stamps bearing the American flag and a portrait of Washington. Both sets comprise seven denominations, 2 centavos, 5c, 10c, 20c, 50c, 1sucre and 2s.

These issues were preceded on May 15th by regular postage, air mail and official. This regular set includes 2c showing the Andes, 5c showing Atahualpa, 10c hat weaver, 20c coast of Ecuador, and 1s gold mine. The air-mail set comprised 10c, 20c, 70c, 1s and 2s denominations all showing a condor. The two series are printed in two colors and overprinted for official purposes.

A map of Ecuador is pictured on the new 5c stamp for raising funds for social insurance and the rebuilding of the Guayaquil postoffice. Its use on all correspondence is compulsory.

Someone Pleased

On the closing day of a rainy fortnight, the seaside visitor read through the hotel bill to the last detail. Then very quietly he remarked: "Well, I'm very glad you have so greatly benefited by our holiday."

Reich-Manchu Trade

speaking, has functioned quite satisfactorily and has proved beneficial to both States. It is only on this account that the pact which originally was to have lapsed at the end of May, this year, has been extended for three more years.

Anyhow, it is a matter for congratulation for the Manchurian farming populace that Germany under the pact promises to buy much Manchurian soya beans, for this means a rise in the purchasing power of the general Manchurian public. From this Japan will benefit much, because she can sell more of her industrial merchandise to Manchoukuo.

Lastly, the significance of the Reich-Manchoukuo trade pact for the promotion of friendly relations, political and commercial, cannot be overlooked. This pact and the Reich-Japanese Anti-Communist Agreement will combine to further the relations among the three Powers as they have actually done in the past.

A "Dear," Too Dear

Retired Auctioneer—And what can you give my daughter?

Industry Opposes

integration would be an Australian calamity.

Urge Stronger Protection

M. T. W. Eady, Victorian Chamber of Manufactures president, emphasized the fact that development of Australian secondary industries is required to provide an enlarged home market for primary producers; their overseas markets are not unlimited.

Urging a more definite Federal Government protection policy, Mr. Eady said that, with an extended Australian market, land settlement would be stimulated and, between the primary and secondary industries, Australia should be able to develop its population to a figure nearer the safety line.

"Manufacturers are convinced that Australia's existing tariff protection is so finely cut that any slight change in the general economic condition would be followed by a rush of importations that would seriously affect local secondary industries," he said.

Russian Mines Open Vista Of Future Might

Christian Science Monitor

MOSCOW—The year 1936 completed six years of intensive exploration of Soviet Russia's natural resources, indicating that the country's mineral deposits may be almost twice as great as they were believed to be in 1930, according to the annual report of the Council for the Study of the Productive Forces of the Country, a section of the Academy of Sciences. During 1936 the Council directed the work of 64 groups of natural scientists, including field expeditions in 11 Soviet republics and regions.

The most important recent discoveries have been made in the mountains of Kazakstan, which Soviet experts now believe may become the richest mineral region in the country. Here have been found not only extensive coal deposits, but also deposits of copper, tin, rare metals, aluminites and potassium salts.

Another great coal basin has been mapped along the Tunguska river, in Eastern Siberia, and the known deposits of the rich Donetz basin in southern European Russia have been increased by 500,000,000 tons.

Huge Iron Total

Iron ore deposits also are estimated at a much larger figure than they were in 1930. The Kursk deposits, unknown in 1917, are now fixed at the amazing total of 200,000,000,000 tons. Important new deposits have been found in Siberia, where none were known to exist a few years ago, and deposits on the Kola peninsula, in the north, are estimated at 500,000,000 tons. The total reserves of iron ore are now estimated at 260,000,000,000 tons.

In these six years, new deposits of copper, lead and zinc have been explored in Kazakstan, Central Asia and the Caucasus. Nickel ores have been found in Kazakstan and on the Kola peninsula. A series of chromite deposits has been found in the Urals.

The deposits of potassium salts, at Verkhne-Kamsk, in the northern Urals, are estimated to be five times as great as all other known deposits. Potassium plays a major part in Soviet plans for fertilizing vast agricultural tracts.

Field expeditions during 1936 discovered additional deposits of potassium salts, oil, lime and phosphorites, tungsten, copper, rare metals, corundum and lunite. At Osinka, near the city of Uralsk in Kazakstan, deposits were found containing 27 per cent potassium chloride and 42 per cent magnesium sulphate. This deposit is believed to be unique, and will permit production of fertilizers for adjacent cotton and tobacco crops, as well as metallic magnesium and soda.

Other Deposits

Two other large deposits of potassium and sulphates were found about 10 miles apart in Atyubinsk province, Kazakstan, at a depth of 100 meters. Drilling showed that the deposits extend at least to the 600-meter level. The special importance of Kazakstan potassium deposits, according to the report, lies in the chemical composition of the salts: the combination of potassium salts with sulphates, and their proximity to agricultural regions where they can be used to best advantage.

Extensive deposits of aluminites were found during 1936 in Central Kazakstan, and the technological process for using these deposits for manufacture of aluminum has been worked out in a special state institute. The necessary electric power is available at the near-by hydro-electric station at Irtysh.

The Soviet Government is expending much time and money in the effort to produce aluminum, useful in manufacture of aircraft and cables. The previous shortage of copper has hampered development of communications, and aluminum is already being substituted for copper. Last year, the Dneiproges aluminum plant produced 24,000 tons, and intends to produce 40,000 tons in 1937 and 60,000 tons in 1938.

It is now apparent, according to the report, that Soviet mineral deposits are fully adequate to fulfil the grandiose plans for development of industry and agriculture. Mineral fertilizers are expected to play a major part in increasing agricultural production by 50 per cent in a few years.

The reserves of oil, coal, iron, are considered sufficient to make Soviet Russia the chief industrial country of Europe, and perhaps of the world within a decade or two.

Figures Can't Lie?

"Figures can't lie," said the professor earnestly. "For instance, if one man can build a house in 12 days, 12 men can build it in one."

"Yes?" interrupted a student. "Then 288 will build it in one hour, 17,280 in one minute and 1,036,809 in one second. And I don't believe they could lay one brick in that time."

While the professor was still gasping, the smart "ready reckoner" went on:

"And again, if one ship can cross the Atlantic in six days, six ships can cross in one day. I don't believe that either; so where's the truth in arithmetic?"

Then he sat down.—Whitewright Sun, Vernon, Texas.

Stranger Than Fiction?

He: "What street is this?"
She: "Belvedere."
He: "Oh, didn't know you had a Belvy street here!"

Italian Harvest Of Wheat Is Seen Up Over 20 P.C.

Christian Science Monitor

ROME,—The Italian wheat harvest this year is expected to prove very satisfactory with an increase of 20 to 30 per cent compared with the 1936 crop.

Speaking before the Permanent Wheat Committee, Minister of Agriculture Edomondo Rossoni stated that weather conditions which had been particularly favorable during the autumn and winter were less so in the late spring, which was characterized by persistent rains followed by sudden high temperatures accompanied in some localities by heavy thunder storms.

This had reacted unfavorably on exceptionally promising crops, but even so the Minister was able to say that in northern and southern Italy—the two great wheat-growing regions—the outlook was excellent, though somewhat less so in central Italy. Taken altogether, he expected that the crop would be "very satisfactory and far superior to that of the preceding year."

All Wheat Goes to Pools

The other cereal, forage and grass crops also promise well; olives have flowered abundantly and early, and vineyards are in good condition.

As from June 12, 1937, the Committee fixed the net price payable to farmers for wheat delivered to the pools at 1250 lire per ton for soft wheat weighing 87 kilograms per hectolitre, and 1400 lire for hard wheat weighing 80 kilograms per hectolitre, with variations up or down for qualities above or below these standards.

All wheat, both home grown and imported, has to be delivered to the pools, which pay the farmers in full on delivery and are financed by the public utility and savings banks authorized thereto.

The pools in each province are placed under a Central Provincial Committee on which sit two representatives of the provincial union of agricultural landowners one of whom is a wheat-farmer, a representative of the provincial union of the agricultural workers, and a representative of the agricultural consortia of the province. The president, representing the banks financing the pools, is appointed by the Minister of Agriculture. These provincial committees are placed under the supervision of the Ministry of Agriculture to which they are responsible.

Seek Larger Corn Crop

During the farm year 1937-38 special attention will be devoted to increasing the yield of the corn crop, and to securing a larger number of head of cattle on the farm. The need of developing dairy-farming to meet the growing demand for milk and its industrial by-products, among which is casein used in the manufacture of lanital (artificial wood), and of increasing the home supply of butcher's meat and animal fats will be kept to the fore as an important part of the self-sufficiency plans which the corporations are now engaged in carrying out.

The system of marketing through delivery to compulsory pools extended last year to wool, hemp, and silk-cocoons remains in force.

As a result of the measures taken since 1935 when the Italian cocoon crop had fallen to 17,000,000 kilograms as against a post-war maximum of 53,000,000 kilograms in 1924, a definite revival can be noted in production.

In 1936 the quantity rose to 32,000,000 kilograms, this year it is estimated at 37,000,000 to 38,000,000 kilograms, and the Corporative Silk Committee is taking steps to raise production to over 40,000,000 kilogram in 1938. This revival has been secured by the government guarantee of a minimum price for all the silk cocoons delivered to the compulsory pools which are managed by the agricultuural consortia and the cooperative cocoon drying establishments under the auspices of the Ministry of Agriculture.

Italy's Economic Self-Sufficiency Plan To Continue

Christian Science Monitor

ROME—Italy continues to show that she intends to follow a policy of economic self-sufficiency despite a declared desire to benefit from an improvement in world trade.

Toward this end the Fascist Government has succeeded in building up a system under which national development is financed by the prudent and skilful use of national savings, and has set its face against large scale foreign indebtedness. To this policy, which began to be enforced exactly 10 years ago, the Government and the country remain faithful, despite recurrent rumors that Italy is seeking foreign loans.

As Dr. Alberto Pirelli, the well-known Italian economist, recently pointed out when addressing the monetary section of the Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce at Berlin, such rumors fail to note that if the creditor countries are presumably unwilling to make foreign loans, recent experience of the burden of foreign indebtedness makes the other countries no less unwilling to receive them.

The policy of self-sufficiency, however, does not mean that enterprise has to be brought to a standstill. On the contrary, Italy gives tangible evidence that she not only can but is financing her own needs, and is doing so on a grand scale. The secret of Fascist finance, it is claimed, is not foregoing expenditure but in making it wisely.

Thus, apart from national defense needs, which in recent years have been given precedence over all others, the vast expenditure incurred by Italy is essentialy for productive purposes, such as the public works carried out in the past decade—land reclamation, irrigation, roads, slum clearance, etc.—and now for the development of the Empire, for which the Italian Cabinet recently assigned 12,000,000,000 lire to be spent over a period of six years.

Energetic and effective action has been taken to stop a leak in the budget largely responsible for recent deficits caused by the disparity between receipts and expenditures of the State railways. The railway deficit, which reappeared in 1931, partly owning to the depression, but still more so to the revolution in transport which has led to the growing competition of road traffic, has now been definitely closed, and this year the State railways are again making a contribution to the Treasury.

All other State industrial activities—the tobacco, salt, and other monopolies and the posts and the telephones—are run on strictly business lines and the Finance Minister is able to point to increasing returns. At the same time the nation's needs are being met out of national resources.

As far as industry is concerned the plans for increasing economic self-sufficiency are also financed at home by the issue of debentures readily taken up by the market. This was the case with the "Anic" and "Finniare" issues made respectively for financing the production of synthetic petrol and the shipbuilding industry.

His Fault

An Aberdonian went to Australia. When he returned three years later he found his three brothers, all with beards, at the railway station.

"What's the big idea?" he asked.

"Ye ken quite weel ye took the traozr awa' wi' ye," was the reply.—Montreal Star.

Social and Personal Notes

RETURNS TO SENDAI

Miss Helen Boyle of Sendai, returned to Japan on board the Dollar liner President Jefferson Saturday after a pleasure trip through China and the Philippines.

GOES ON RESEARCH TOUR

Dr. H. H. Martin, professor at the University of Washington arrived in Yokohama Saturday on board the President Jefferson. He left his Oriental Tour Party at Yokohama to make an extensive tour of Japan to obtain research data and motion pictures of Japan.

PASSES THROUGH

Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr., accompanied by her son Quentin, passed through Yokohama Saturday on board the President Jefferson en route to their home at Oyster Bay, New York, after spending the summer in China and the Philippines.

MOVES TO Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Y. T. Eckersley, a member of the International Debating Team of the University of Melbourne, who has been staying at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Graham during the summer has moved to the Y.M.C.A. apartments. Mr. Wilmot and Mr. Allan Benjamin, also members of the team, are also at the Y.M.C.A.

WEEK-END IN KARUIZAWA

Mr. Alfred Nipkow and Mr. K. M. Fox drove up to Karuizawa Saturday and spent the week-end at the Mampei Hotel.

RETURNING TO MISSOURI

Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Conant, of Overland, Missouri, passed through Japan on board the President Jefferson on their way back to their home after a month's travel in the Orient. Mr. Conant is a well known lawyer and politician of Missouri.

LEAVING FOR KARUIZAWA

Mr. and Mrs. James A. Rabbit and Miss A. Brooks will leave for Karuizawa Wednesday where they plan to take a house in the Nohara Compound for the month of September.

RETURNS TO OSAKA

Mr. James Aurell, who has been staying with his family in Karuizawa for the past two weeks returned to Osaka Sunday.

RETURNS TO TOKYO

Mr. John Gadsby has returned to Tokyo after a trip to Korea.

EN ROUTE TO PORTLAND

Mrs. F. L. Davidson and Mrs. Evelyn Ballard, both of Shanghai, China are en route to Portland, Oregon on board the President Jefferson for a short holiday.

RETURN TO TOKYO

Mr. and Mrs. Steintorf returned to Tokyo Monday from Karuizawa where Mrs. Steintorf has spent the summer.

TO VISIT IN NOJIRI

Mr. John Weckerling and her two children are leaving Karuizawa Wednesday to visit at the home of Mrs. Kai E. Rasmussen in Nojiri.

RETURNING TO UNITED STATES

Mrs. Joseph R. Jackson, wife of the Assistant Attorney General of the United States is returning to the States after a pleasure trip throughout the Orient, on board the Dollar liner President Jefferson. She is accompanied by Mrs. Frank G. Ashbrook. They were joined by their husbands at Kobe.

RETURNING HOME

Dr. W. V. Glaisyer, accompanied by Mrs. Glaisyer and their children, Miss Betty, Miss Dorothy and Mr. R. A. Glaisyer who have been on a month's tour of Japan, China and the Philippines are en route to their home in the States on board the President Jefferson.

EN ROUTE TO SEATTLE

Miss Eunice Bowman and Miss Esther Dempsey, who have been on a summer round trip of the Orient are en route to their homes in the United States on board the President Jefferson.

ON BOARD PRESIDENT JEFFERSON

Among the passengers who disembarked from the Dollar liner President Jefferson at Yokohama Saturday were: Miss Helen Boyle, Mrs. E. Harrington, Dr. H. H. Martin, Mr. A. W. Miller and Mr. E. Moltzer.

Those who disembarked at Kobe were: Mr. M. T. Assomull, Mrs. K. B. Henry, Mr. A. H. A. Khadbai, Rev. J. B. Livesay, Mrs. J. B. Livesay, Miss A. M. Maginnis, Mr. K. Miyai, Mrs. K. M. Studdert, Miss Ann Studdert, Mr. M. Suleman and Mr. A. H. Tayub.

GRANTED SCHOLARSHIP

Mr. Tsuyoshi Matsumoto, organist and pupil of Dr. Clarence Dickinson of New York, has been granted a scholarship from the School of Sacred Music of the Union Theological Seminary in New York City, from which he graduated in 1935 with the degree of Master of Sacred Music. Mr. Matsumoto will sail from Yokohama September 9 aboard the N.Y.K. liner Hikawa Maru. He is one of the first alumni of the school to become a candidate for the degree of Doctor of Music.

90 P.C. In Chicago Willing To Take Disease Tests

N.Y. Herald Tribune

CHICAGO, July 31.—Analysis of the early returns of Chicago's poll to determine how many of its 3,500,000 citizens are willing to submit to free tests for syphilis show that an overwhelming majority of those returning questionnaires are voting "yes."

Dr. Louis E. Schmidt, secretary of the Chicago Board of Health, reported today that of 4,165 answers tallied so far 3,829, more than 90 per cent, voted "yes," while only 336 voted "no."

"The number voting 'yes,'" said Dr. Schmidt, "is beyond all expectations. It is an exceptionally good omen that most of the people who have responded so far are in favor of the tests."

Replies have been coming in since last Monday at the rate of 1,000 to 2,000 a day, faster than six clerks of the Board of Health have been able to tabulate them. A large crew of W. P. A. workers is mailing out more than 1,000,000 questionnaires in the first city-wide poll of its sort ever attempted. To date, 300,000 questionnaires have been placed in the mails in franked envelopes furnished by the United States government. The poll is being conducted by the local health authorities in conjunction with state and Federal agencies. Dr. Schmidt expects one out of four questionnaires to be filled out.

How accurate his estimate is will not be known probably for six weeks. An educational drive, aided by business and industrial leaders, the clergy, veteran organizations and the service clubs, is under way to impress upn the public the value of the poll.

When the returns from the questionnaires have been finally tabulated, the Chicago Board of Health expects to be in position to estimate not only the facilities needed for administering wholesale tests for syphilis infection, but beyond that, for treating persons who are discovered to be suffering from the disease.

Four thousand Chicago doctors have offered to cooperate in giving tests to persons desiring them. Those wishing to be tested will be expected ordinarily to visit their own private physician, thus keeping any possible infection a confidential matter between the individual and his regular doctor.

Funds would be raised to reimburse physicians who do not feel able to provide free blood tests to applicants, Dr. Schmidt said today, pointing out that the poll would be useful in estimating how much money would be needed for this purpose.

Prof. Lou Gehrig Hit At Columbia

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Aug. 1—Lou Gehrig, the Yankees' $36,000-a-year first baseman, who left Columbia College as a youth to become one of baseball's outstanding players, returned to his alma mater yesterday in the role of professor.

Delivering the third lecture in the current baseball series sponsored by Teachers College, Columbia University, as Physical Education S 160 D, Mr. Gehrig discoursed for an hour before 150 listeners in the Pupin Physics Building on styles on play in baseball. His thesis was that there is no set style of play.

Seasoned classroom veterans, who watched him perform his professorial duties almost flawlessly, observed only one deviation from standard classroom procedure. Mr. Gehrig forgot to take the roll.

Had he done so he would have found that he was pouring out trade secrets to 110 ringers who were deriving the benefits of his expert advice free of charge. While 150 were on hand to hear the baseball academician when class began at 9:30 A. M., subsequent investigation of the Teachers College rolls revealed that only forty students were officially registered to take the course, having paid the necessary $12.50 fee.

Of the 110 ringers, ten were neighborhood youngsters, ranging in age from 7 to 15 years. Two Teachers College women students also were present, swelling the female representation in the class to three.

The youngsters, including 7-year-old Bill Hughes, son of Professor W. L. Hughes, in charge of the course, appeared to be more interested in Mr. Gehrig's autograph than in his lecture, which was delivered eloquently enough.

The Yankee star, collegiately attired in slacks and sport jacket, pointed to the varying style of successful players in emphasizing that there really is no "right" way. Swinging a heavy baseball bat, which he used to demonstrate his points, he declared that Babe Ruth had broken during his baseball career more fundamental rules than any other player.

Explaining his own success as a hitter, Mr. Gehrig declared:

"I don't lunge at the ball. I wait until it's over the plate and then step in just a few inches."

Rains That Aid Soviet's Grains Slow Harvest

By JOSEPH BARNES

N. Y. Herald Tribune

MOSCOW, July 31.—"One good harvest year in Russia atones for five bad ones." The Bolsheviks have not forgotten this comment of Catherine the Great, but they want a bumper crop this year not so much for food reserves as to atone for recent political, industrial and military setbacks.

From all present appearances they will get it. The most recent official report showed 31 per cent of all grain reaped by July 25. Collective farmers near Moscow predict the best harvest in many years, and foreign experts who have inspected the grains in the Ukraine and the North Caucasus—Russia's breadbasket—make similar predictions.

At the same time the Bolshevik leaders are not overlooking the real dangers ahead. The grain stands higher than a man's head in many regions because of abundant rains, but the same rain is now making speedy and efficient harvest a really difficult problem. In Moscow there have been only three rainless days in July.

Rain "No Excuse"

This time last year 38 per cent of all grains had been harvested. Party leaders reject rain as "an un-Bolshevik excuse for bad work." They are still excoriating the machine and tractor stations and collective farm managers for failure to repair tractors and combines quickly or to build adequate drying sheds. But the political asset of a record harvest—which Russia needs—still apparently depends on the rainfall in the next few weeks.

If there is even a short dry spell for harvesting it will be the real test of Russia's new collectivized agriculture. Ninety per cent of Russia's sown area is being harvested this year by 250,000 collective farms. They have 25 per cent more tractors than last year. Fifty-two thousand new combines are working on the Russian steppes—more than doubling last year's figure.

Drought Cut 1936 Yield

Even if the harvest does not fulfil Joseph Stalin's challenge to produce 7,000,000,000 puds (126,000,000 tons), there is a better chance of exceeding the 1935 record harvest of 90,000,000 tons. Last year a drought over Russia's central sections cut the yield to 76,000,000 tons.

The last harvest of the second five-year plan is taking place concurrently with wide discussion of what Stalin has called the third phase of Russia's agricultural revolution. After changing the economic basis of all farming by collectivization and the technical basis by tractor production the Bolsheviks are attempting currently to complete the establishment of Socialist agriculture by intensive concentration on scientific agronomy.

The June plenum of the party's central committee—a report of which was awaited more expectantly than for any similar meeting in recent years—produced nothing more exciting politically than a long decree on crop rotation, seed selection and scientific agronomy. Details subsequently published indicate that the decision may have large importance in the Soviet Union's perennial struggle to solve its basic agricultural problems.

Seed Reserve Planned

One of its concrete consequences will be a 1,500,000-ton seed reserve to be accumulated by the government over the next three years. The farmers will receive this year considerably higher prices for all grain meeting the requirements for selected seed.

Since 1930 the Soviet Union's sown area has fluctuated less than 5 per cent. The rye belt may be pushed steadily but slowly northward, but the real problem in increasing grain production is increasing the yield an acre.

This emphasis on agronomy does not indicate the failure, according to the Bolsheviks, of their earlier campaigns for collectivization and mechanization of agriculture. It is predicated on the belief that only now the traditional technical backwardness of the Russian muzhik can be successfully replaced by modern farming methods.

Janitor Is Seized

the rescue story to extort $2,000 from Mr. Putnam and that his possession of the Earhart scarf had inspired the idea.

Last Saturday Mr. Putnam received a note which had been left for him at the Hotel Barclay, written on the stationery of the hotel. It said: "We have your wife on the ship. I will call Sunday at 2 o'clock."

At about 10 P. M. the same day Mr. Putnam received a telephone call at the hotel. The voice of a man told him that if he would arrange a meeting on Sunday Mr. Putnam would receive important information about Miss Earhart. The meeting was arranged for 2 A. M. Sunday at the same hotel.

Tells Story of "Rescue"

Rothar, who introduced himself as Johnson, arrived at the appointed hour and told Mr. Putnam the following story:

He had been employed, he said, as a seaman on a vessel that was running arms to Spain. The ship, he declared, was on her way to Panama from New Guinea in the Southern Pacific in the latter part of June. A few days out of New Guinea the skipper anchored off a small island to take on fresh water.

In a cove on this island, Rothar said, a wrecked airplane was discovered. The body of a man was lying on a wing of the plane. On the rocky shore a woman was standing, in nothing but a pair of athletic shorts. The sharks, he said, had eaten away the lower part of the man's body. The ship's crew buried the man at sea, and took aboard the woman, who was "out of her mind" and badly injured.

A Chinese doctor on board the vessel treated the woman for the rest of the voyage. It had been necessary, Rothar said, to give her blood transfusions.

No one knew at that time who the woman was, Rothar said, but upon arriving at Panama they recognized her from newspaper photographs as Amelia Earhart. Members of the crew, Rothar explained, became panic-stricken because they were afraid that their gun-running activity would be discovered. Miss Earhart were put ashore.

"We came to New York," he said, "and I was elected by the crew to see you to see if we can't get her off our hands. The boat has a lot of cut-throats aboard and they talked about dumping your wife into the sea."

Rothar explained that Miss Earhart was so ill she would have to be taken ashore soon to a hospital. The men on his vessel, he said, expected to be paid for the rescue before they would surrender her.

"Can you bring me a lock of her hair," Mr. Putnam asked, "or something to assure me that you have her aboard?"

Rothar said that he could and that he would call the following day at Mr. Putnam's office with his proof.

Scarf Is Identified

The Bronx janitor called last Monday at Mr. Putnam's office, where the publisher introduced him to "my confidential secretary," one of Mr. Whitley's agents. He exhibited the brown and white scarf. Mr. Putnam did not recognize it, but his stenographer identified it as one Miss Earhart had worn several years ago.

Rothar explained that the crew had decided not to release Miss Earhart unless Mr. Putnam paid $2,000. The publisher said he would pay that amount gladly and invited Rothar to return the following day to collect it. Rothar did. He accepted $1,000 in cash and was on his way to a bank to get a check for the remainder when Mr. Putnam's "secretary," who accompanied him, placed him under arrest.

While all the negotiations were going on, Federal agents had made a check-up on Rothar. They found out that he lived at the Bronx address under the name of Goodenough. He is 42 years old. He was born at City Island. Before he became a janitor he was a woodworker. He will be arraigned in Felony Court this morning pending action by a New York County grand jury.

80 Foreign Aviators Working For Chinese

By The Domei Tenshin Sha

SHANGHAI, Aug. 28—No less than 80 foreign pilots, including a number of White Russians, are now employed by the Chinese air force in raiding Japanese positions in and around the Shanghai area, it is revealed here today.

These pilots of foreign nationalities live in Shanghai, and are assuming their duties at several Chinese airdromes situated in the vicinity of this city.

Roosevelt Still For Stable Dollar

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 3.—President Roosevelt still favors the kind of dollar which will have the same buying and debt-paying power from one generation to another, according to a letter produced by Senator Thomas today before a subcommittee of the Senate Agriculture Committee. The letter was written last May as a personal communication to the Oklahoma Senator.

The subcommittee was conducting hearings on a bill Mr. Thomas introduced early in this session of Congress to set up a national monetary authority charged with maintaining the value of the dollar at its 1926 level, measured by the general price index of that period.

Mr. Thomas also submitted a statement of monetary policy by the Federal Reserve Board, sent to him by Marriner S. Eccles, chairman in which it was stated that price stability, as such, was only the means to the more important end of general economic stability.

"I am in complete sympathy with your objective with respect to the elimination of unnecessary fluctuations in the value of the dollar," Mr. Roosevelt wrote. "The United States is still seeking the kind of dollar which a generation hence will have the same purchasing and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future."

Balanced Recovery Urged

"I am sure that you also agree with me that stabilization of the value of the dollar will be attained not merely by monetary means and devices, though these are necessary, but much more by the achievement of balanced and orderly recovery throughout the whole economy, and by its maintenance once achieved.

"However, in view of the complexity of the rapidly shifting international scene at present it would be dangerous to adjust ourselves to any rigid pattern. It is doubtful whether procedure on the lines you suggest will be rewarded with that measure of success which we could justly expect, were the international situation to have undergone clarification.

"For this reason I believe that to commit ourselves definitely at this time to a formalized course of action might well be premature and might therefore even do more harm than good, both at home and abroad.

"You may rest assured that we are watching all developments in the monetary sphere with a view to making any timely contribution we can. The monetary understanding reached last September first from England and France and then with a number of other countries was rightly interpreted as being a great step forward in the attainment of the external stability of the dollar, as well as in the promotion of international economic cooperation."

Reserve Board Views Offered

The views of the Federal Reserve Board were set forth as follows:

"That wide fluctuations in the price level are disastrous is beyond question and determined efforts should be made to prevent such fluctuations as would endanger economic stability.

"The board is convinced, however, that the broader objective of maximum sustainable utilization of the nation's resources cannot be achieved by attempting to maintain a fixed level of prices, and that, therefore, price stability should not be the sole or principal objective of monetary policy.

"Stabilization of individual prices by monetary means is not proposed, nor would it be feasible. Proposals for price stability necessarily refer to some index or average of prices. There is no general agreement on the question of what constitutes a satisfactory price index for this purpose, although the general wholesale commodity price index is often suggested.

"Monetary authorities may contribute to economic stability by exerting an influence to maintain a flow of funds conducive to as full a use of the country's productive resources as can be continuously sustained to keep the banking machinery of the country in sound condition.

Holds Sound Banking Necessary

"The board recognizes that even an adequate supply of money will not perform its functions adequately if the banking structure through which it must operate is in an unsound condition, and that a sound banking structure cannot be sustained if the supply of money is insufficient and a deflation is under way.

"An attempt to make either price stability or the broader object of economic stability the particular concern of the Federal Reserve System, without recognizing the fact that the attainment of the objective would require the cooperation of other agencies of the government, is impractical.

"To sum up, the board believes that ecoomic stability rather than price stability should be the general objective of public policy. It is convinced that this objective cannot be achieved by monetary policy alone, but that the goal should be sought through coordination of monetary and other major policies of the government which influence business activity, including particularly policies with respect to taxation, expenditures, lending, foreign trade, agriculture and labor.

"It should be the declared objective of the Government of the United States to maintain economic stability, and it should be the recognized duty of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to use all its powers to contribute to a concerted effort by all agencies of the Government toward the attainment of this objective."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Princess Watutsi of Congo

The belles of Belgian Congo and other countries of Central and South Africa adorn themselves in bizarre manners that pale the girls of the rest of the world into insignificance. I have seen Kikuyu girls of Kenya Colony wearing railroad spikes and track bolts in their ears, and as much as 40 pounds of telephone wire around their necks. And I have seen the Ubangi women with 12-inch wood and metal plates stretched into their lower lips. But this royal princess of the Congo is the most heavily dressed of all. With her skirt of telephone wire, wire wrapped around her legs to make her "stockings" a foot in diameter, and the heavy brass, steel and copper bracelets and necklaces, her ornaments increase her weight not less than 150 pounds.

Filming Animals

lows training in digging through the soft soil toward the voice. This technique is employed also whenever a dog must scratch at a door. It is valuable when a dog must crawl toward an object, too. Obviously, all these scenes are made without sound.

When the he-man dog pictures were in their vogue—Rin Tin Tin and its fellows—the screen was silent and mostly out of doors, and the dog performances consisted principally of dashing across open spaces to rescue some one or other. This, of course, was easy. The trainer called the animal to him, and discipline did the rest.

But other animals cannot be trained in this thorough manner. Cats are rarely used in photoplays because they are hopeless. The large members of the cat family are, besides, dangerous. Special technique is called into play when a Tarzan or serial thriller demands the big cats.

The usual system is erection of a rather large fenced inclosure, perhaps 200 feet or more across. This is lined with palms and other "native" foliage to conceal the bars, which are more than high enough for the friskiest animals. An African grass-hut village may be built in the inclosure as well, if the script indicates this. Then the lions or tigers are let loose.

There is little effort to make these animals perform. Rather, the director mounts cameras about the inclosure at strategic points, shooting between the bars and from atop them. The trainers crack their whips and the animals run about aimlessly, and probably wonderingly. The cameras grind on until they run out of film, and next day the director has sufficient lion or tiger in the cans to piece together chases, retreats, almost any normal feline behavior. Unlike dogs, all tigers and all lions look fairly much alike to the audience, and thus the animal that starts the chase need not be the one that completes it. After the animals are removed, the residents of the native village are brought in for their work.

When a close-up of an actor in a death embrace with a lion is required, one singularly tame animal is left in the inclosure. The trainer, made up more or less to resemble the actor, at least in long shot, wrestles with his pet. It is strictly his own peril and his own business, for director and camera man remain outside the fences. After all, a trainer is fairly easy to replace.

So it goes with all the pictures for which Hollywood brings the jungle to it. But there are cases, such as "Elephant Boy" and "African Holiday," in which the cinema goes to the jungle. These films, of course, are even more hit-or-miss in so far as the quality of animal portrayals is concerned.

The jungle camera man sets up his equipment, occasionally with sound recorders, near the water hole or other rendezvous of the native wild life (it is almost always in Africa, it would appear). When time and fortune favor him, he grinds away, catching whatever he can on celluloid. If enough thousands of feet of film are exposed, he can bring back to the studios fairly representative scenes of authenticity and thrills. But he is likely to find that he has suffered from lack of lighting control, for one thing and total inability to make the beasts do what he would like to expect of them. "African Holiday" shows the effects of the tropical sun's overlighting and the lack of continuity which must result when a camera expedition simply grinds and prays.

Americans Spend $500,000,000 A Year On Liquor

The Digest

Were you to dissect the average American tippler in terms of what he drinks, you would find him to be composed of 27 parts beer, 2 parts liquor, and 1 part wine. Analyzing his liquor content further, it is three-fourths whiskey, one-fourth gin, rum, and brandy.

The money Americans annually spend for liquor accounts for a $500,000,000 distilled spirits industry, five times as great in capitalization as in pre-war days. Its 100-odd companies are scattered throughout the country, although 90 per cent of the industry is concentrated in Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

Big Three among United States distillers are National Distillers Products Corporation (Old Overholt, Crab Orchard), Schnley Distillers Corporation (Wilkens Family, Golden Wedding), and the Canadian corporation of Distillers Corporation-Seagrams, Limited (Seagrams' Crown brands). These three account for 60 per cent of the industry's output. The Canadian corporation, Hiram Walker-Gooderham and Worts, Limited (Conadian Club, G and W) and the American company of Frankfort Distilleries, Incorporated (Four Roses, Paul Jones; distillers of one-fourth of all medicinal whiskey during prohibition), also are sizable.

Distillers today differ as broadly from their pre-prohibition predecessors as do drinking habits then and now. Two decades ago, distillers merely concerned themselves with the production of raw whiskey, which they passed on to rectifiers who diluted it (first with water to reduce the alcoholic content from 180 proof to 100 or less; and then with other mature whiskies), and retailed it to the public. Today distillers do their own rectifying, and distributing as well; hence have problems of competition, Government regulation and anti-wet sentiment which provide a perpetual hangover.

Although 3.2 beer is legal in the driest of states—Kansas and Oklahoma—and wines are legal as well in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Georgia, it is the remaining forty-three states (and the District of Columbia) which are "all wet" as far as distillers are concerned, figuratively as well as literally.

These forty-three provide distillers with a statistician's nightmare. Twenty-six have state license systems, wherein liquor is manufactured, distributed and retailed by private dealers licensed by the state. Fourteen more have monopoly systems, under which state stores sell packaged liquor. Wyoming has a monopoly of wholesalers, but permits retailers to be licensed by counties. Alabama and North Carolina are largely dry, but permit counties which voted wet to set up state liquor stores. In addition, the federal Government licenses all distillers.

Further to complicate matters, distillers (as well as brewers and wine growers) are subjected to discriminatory legislation in one third of the forty-three wet states, which hampers the importation of alcoholic beverages made in others.

To consolidate distillers into a united front, the Distilled Spirits Institute, Inc., trade association of the industry, was formed in 1934. Head of the institute is short, slim Dr. James M. Doran, who was Commissioner of Prohibition between 1927 and 1933, and who has found time while working to acquire three college degrees. Associates of Dr. Doran term him not only "a gentleman, a scholar and a judge of good whiskey," but the only one capable of consolidating the warring factions within the industry. Typical of this two fisted, spunky little man is the motto that hangs in his Washington office: "Kwitcherdambellaikn."

To some liquor men, 450,000,000 gallons of liquor stored in distillery warehouses (twice as much as in pre-prohibition days) present a problem. They view this as excessive, as over-production.

Others less concerned argue that it is due to the assumed pent-up demand for liquor, which did not live up to expectations. They view it as a normal approach to an equilibrium to be reached when consumption reaches its natural level.

Liquor taxes (whiskey, wine and beer) have become the second best revenue producer to the federal Government, topped only by income taxes. During 1936, federal revenues on domestic liquor alone totalled $569,081,000 and state taxes $252,345,476—together, $821,426,476.

In terms of a gallon of whiskey, the federal Government levies taxes totalling $2—irrespetcive of quality. To this the states add an average $1.60. Average price of a gallon of whiskey is $8, or $1 a pint. Thus, for a dollar pint of whiskey, forty-five cents goes in taxes.

Liquor men argue that if taxes were reduced, people would buy more legal liquor and bootlegging would be wiped out altogether. To prove their contention, they point to the post-Civil War period. Between 1866 and 1868 the average federal tax on a gallon of whiskey was $2. Between 1869 and 1872 the average tax was 50 cents. During that latter period per capita consumption increased one and a half gallons, federal revenues an average of $10,000,000.

Tastes in liquor have changed since the War. Two decades ago, blended whiskies were the most popular drink and were taken "neat." During prohibition drinkers turned to bathtub gin (alcohol plus juniper berry juice), corn liquor, and "stuff right off the boat—scraped off." Today, due to preferences of women and effects of prohibition, more cocktails and highballs are consumed.

Three things have not changed since the War: East of the Alleghanies is Rye country; west is Bourbon country. Southerners prefer drinks with a smaller alcoholic content than do Northerners.

C.C.C. Announces 9-Cent Cotton Loan

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Aug. 30—Ending a long period of much speculation and prediction, the Commodity Credit Corporation here today announced a cotton loan of 9 cents per pound on cotton of ⅞ inch staple, middling or better; 8 cents on cotton of 13/16 staple or better; and 7¼ cents on other cotton.

Simultaneously, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation announced that it would lend to the C.C.C. a total sum of $150,000,000 wherewith to make loans.

The loan announcement was accompanied with a subsidy offer of no more than three cents per pound to producers, who will agree to cooperate with the Administration in next year's cotton control program.

The subsidy will not cover the entire cotton crop but it will apply to 65 per cent of the basic production and will be payable next year after cotton growers have complied with the cotton control program.

British Delegation To To Geneva Chosen

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, Aug. 31—Great Britain's delegation to the League's Council and Assembly sessions will be composed of British Foreign Secretary R. Anthony Eden, Mr. Walter Elliott, Minister to Scotland; Lord Cranborne, Undersecretary of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. David Colville, Undersecretary of the Treasury, it is understood today.

Premier Neville Chamberlain is not contemplating a trip to Geneva as previously reported. Captain Eden, it is learned, will most likely meet Foreign Minister Yven Delbos and other members of the Chautemps government, when he reaches Paris en route to Geneva as was previously reported. The delegation is expected to leave about the middle of next week.

Franco Deal Seen For Juan As King

By GEORGE ATKELSSON

N. Y. Times

PARIS, Aug. 6—That General Francisco Franco is trying actively to unify his support by moving to restore the Spanish monarchy is indicated by reports here from authoritative sources that he has sent an envoy to Portugal to ask Don Manuel Falconde, the Carlist leader, to support Don Juan, Prince of Asturias, for King.

Senor Falconde, who fell from grace early in January for trying to establish Carlist military academies, has ever since been in Lisbon.

Since then General Franco has also suppressed the Phalanxists (Fascists) when he put down their projected putsch on April 15 and 16, jailing Manuel Hedilla and hundreds of his lieutenants. It is believed he has now found he needs some other more effective unifier than his partido unico (single party) and that the only formula that can appease the majority of Spaniards inside and even beyond General Franco's own territory, as well as the big foreign powers, is a monarchy.

Lack of Support Seen

The Salamanca Government is held to have failed to establish a powerful party to support it in the rear. Since its putsch miscarried and its leaders were imprisoned, the Falange Espanola has become a device of military leaders. On the fronts Nationalist youth has shed its lifeblood, but in the rear its spokesmen have been put out of the game.

Whenever the really new Spanish nationalism has tried to make its voice heard, it has immediately met with suspicion, even resistance, from the Traditionalists.

The Traditionalists, who are General Franco's only real dependable support, are the aristocrats, military men and the Catholic Church, the same pillars on which the monarch leaned for support. Therefore it is regarded as natural that General Franco in his hour of need should look to the Bourbons, in this case Don Juan, former King Alfonso's third son, who would be proclaimed King with General Franco at his side playing the Mussolini role.

General Franco has never concealed his liking for Prince Juan. Recently he stated in an interview that "some day his [Juan's] life might be precious to us."

Alfonso Has Not Abdicated

One drawback to the plan attributed to General Franco is that Alfonso XIII never abdicated. But reports from Lausanne, Switzerland, where the former King is now staying, reiterate that Alfonso is conferring with Spanish Traditionalist leaders, and this would seem to bear out the supposition that General Franco is trying to make a deal to have Alfonso abdicate in favor of his son.

Alfonso's chief counselor since the Duke of Miranda died, the Count de los Andes, is an active Franco worker from the unofficial Nationalist consulate at Saint-Jean-de-Luz, France.

Whatever happens, General Franco faces the task of laying foundations for his new State, and it is said to be by no means certain that he has any definite conception of what these foundations are to be like. True, General Franco has repeatedly, in appeals to the people, proclaimed his faith in a corporative State and promised his new State would be devoted to socially constructive task. He may eventually create organizations to signify outwardly that he has succeeded in building a corporative State, but, it is argued, his own people must get in behind him or he will fail.

Even in the event of his victory and apart from the abysmal chasm dividing Valencia and Salamanca supporters, it is safe to say that the industrial proletariat will always persist in its present attitude. There does not and never has existed any big educated influential Spanish middle class, so even if surviving members of the middle class in Valencia territory rally to General Franco, their support will be a negligible asset.

Valencia has partitioned and distributed big landowners' properties among small farmers, and if General Franco attempts restitution of these lands to their former owners he will certainly find farmers and agricultural laborers joining with the Labor Opposition, thus jeorpardizing the foundations for any State he might try to create. Then iron-fisted dictatorship in the shadow of a throne is regarded here as General Franco's best bet.

BABY FISH TO HAVE WEEK IN LIMELIGHT

A baby fish protection week will be proclaimed by the Aquatic Bureau of the Fukuoka Prefectural Office throughout Fukuoka Prefecture from September 1. During the week lecture meetings are to be held at several places in the prefecture.

INCIDENT DECREASES RESORT VISITORS

A sharp decrease in the number of summer visitors is reported at several summer resorts near Tokyo due to the China Incident, and decreases of 2,000 to 8,000 in passengers were recorded by the Tokyo Railway Bureau for month ending August 20.

CITY TO STRESS IMPORTANCE OF WELLS

To prepare for emergencies, the Water department of the Tokyo Municipality will start the a movement to protect wells and make the citizens recognize the importance of wells when the water service is suspended by enemy air raids.

According to a recent investigation, 120,000 wells are still being used in Tokyo.

FARM TO OFFER PUPILS PRACTICAL TRAINING

A large farm will be opened for pupils of 8 primary schools and a higher girl's school in Yotsuya Ward at Komae-mura, Tokyo Prefecture, by the Yotsuya Educational Society from September 1. Not only farming, but the raising of carp and bees and other useful arts will be taught at the farm.

HERONS BALK FARMERS' CARP-RAISING PROJECTS

Herons coming from the mountainous district surrounding Lake Biwa have lately been proving a great menace to the new industry of raising carp in the paddy-fields in different parts of Shiga Prefecture.

For some years past, the farmers have succeeded in raising the fish in their rice-fields under the guidance of the Hikone Aquatic Industrial Experimental Station, but due to the dry spell and herons that prey on the fish the industry is about to collapse this year.

A carp-show to have been held under the auspices of the Hikone Aquatic Industrial Station was cancelled because there were few exhibitors due to this situation and the Sino-Japanese Incident. The authorities have promised the carp-raisers to do their best to get rid of the herons which have done damage totaling about ¥90,000.

Keep Cool By Watching Diet In Hot Weather

By EDDA MORGAN

N. Y. Times

When New York sizzles in a heat wave the Health Commissioner unusually issues a warning—as he did a few days ago—to "watch your diet." Meat but once a day, avoidance of large amounts of sugars and fats, substitution of ice cream for rich pastries, plenty of cool water but no ice-cold drinks, with "leafy vegetables, raw vegetables, salads and fruits conspicuous on your menu"—such was his advice, and the markets indicate that it was heeded in a considerable measure.

Sales of buttermilk rose in the recent protracted hot spell 100 per cent; of oranges, melons, cucumbers, lettuce and tomatoes 20 per cent; and of milk on the worst days, 10 to 15 per cent. Meats, especially pork, and also butter and eggs were in lessened demand. But reports showed smoked and prepared meats in increased use. The diminished call for eggs and the larger use of prepared meats were deemed to reflect some confusion—or in the latter case a desire to get out of the kitchen.

Which foods are coolest has been established. The calorie expresses the heat (or energy) producing values of foodstuffs when taken into the body. In the tables of dietitians nuts and fresh fish rank lowest in calories or heating qualities per stated unit of weight. Milk and potatoes come second (700 calories), then—each in the order named stepping up the bodily heating—are listed herrings, shelled peas and beans, veal, eggs, poultry and game, beef, mutton, rice, wheat flour, oatmeal, cheese (same heating power as oatmeal), refined sugar, cocoa, bacon, butter, and olive oil, which registers 9,300 calories as compared with 500 for fresh fish.

But as man needs energy even to resist warm weather, expert cookery combines a selection from these foods with the fruits and green vegetables required for the dietary balance and vitamins essential to normal health—as well as coolness. Since about the time that food restrictions were imposed during the World War New Yorkers have gradually modified their regimen. Though some restaurants still advertise "four-course luncheons" in mid-summer, the content of the courses is much less than in the hearty pre-war days. Midday meals and evening dinners and, of course, breakfasts are more spare, even delicate.

At home, the New York housewife in general stands guard over the menu. Whatever shortage or excess she detects in the "business lunches" of her family she studies to make allowance for at the main repast.

Nowadays, thanks to the roominess and efficiency of refrigerators, the city housewife finds it no problem to keep foods cold during a sizzling heat wave. Nor—with a little intelligent use of available equipment—does she find it too enervating to get foods cooked. If her oven and broiler are not insulated, she forsakes them on hot days, remembering that she, too, is expected to beware of getting overheated. Fish, steaks and chops are panbroiled with less heat on top burners, she finds. Fresh biscuits, potatoes, custards and other baked foods that taste good even on hot days are done to a turn in those round, top-of-the-stove ovens specially designed for use over low heat. Meats and fowl are pronounced delicious braised in hold-the-heat Dutch ovens with self-basting lids, which slowly tender the food over a low fire—even over the tiny "simmer burner."

Vegetables, today's housewife finds, are acceptable cooked up in quantity, the excess to be made into salad or creamed or pickled. Beets are favorites for pickling with hard-cooked eggs and sliced raw onion. Cooked vegetables that are popular in salads taste best, connoisseurs say, if they are allowed to chill first in a highly seasoned French dressing before they are finally served with mayonnaise, cooked dressing or sour-cream dressing.

All creamed foods, stews and other meat combinations in sauce, or en casserole, or such dishes as stuffed peppers are made to advantage ahead of time, the skilled hot-weather cook finds, and reheated at the last moment. Dishes such as macaroni in a cheese sauce are to be had without benefit of oven—the prized buttered crumb topping made by skillet-browning a half cup or so of fine bread-crumbs in two tablespoonfuls of butter.

While speaking of macaroni, it is worthy of note that New Yorkers, though not surrendering their liking for potato salad with cold cuts, change off more and more to macaroni salad, made with a highly seasoned cooked dressing mixed with finely cut onion, shredded green pepper and canned pimiento.

As for the cold cuts themselves, the variety has greatly increased in the past year. The most appetizing cold platters seen at buffet spreads show a variety of meats carefully selected for contrast in color as well as texture. Ham, though still favored, the housewife serves sparingly if at all on hot days, for its heating quality measures 1,000 more calories than beef and 2,000 more than poultry or game.

Pot or cottage cheese is so popular in certain New York restaurants during hot weather that the makers supply it to dealers in large quantities fresh every day. It probably has fewer calories than regular cheese, which is a third more heating to the body than mutton, even. But pot cheese is mostly served in Summer in the colorful company of sliced cucumbers, tomatoes or green peppers with salad dressing. A dressing of sour cream makes this cheese still more nourishing and gives it what some consider a pleasantly heightened acidity. Some like it with chopped green pepper, pimiento, chive or raw onion mixed in. In salad combinations, pineapple is a favorite ingredient.

New York is unique among American cities, it is said, for its consumption of sour cream. Not only is this bought daily in some sections for the home table but many restaurants make it a staple Summer feature—served generously in bowls mixed with finely cut chive or green onion, sliced crisp cucumber, radishes or green pepper; or served with berries of the season; or as a topping for warm berry or cherry pie. Others whip it up with a little grated onion, a squeeze of lemon juice, a dash of sugar, pepper and salt, and use it as a dressing for raw or cooked vegetable salads or for fish. Those who like it declare there is no Summer food more refreshing than sour cream. Its base, milk, in fact, is almost as cool a food as nuts or fresh fish.

Though eggs are versatile enough and cool enough (measured in calories) to grace every meal from breakfast to midnight supper, in every course from appetizer to dessert it is the egg stuffed with anchovies, olives, bits of shellfish or pickles, and piquantly seasoned, that gets most attention in Summer.

US Is Planning To Build World's Safest Steamer

By VICTOR H. BERNSTEIN

Times, London

NEW YORK, Aug. 8—The Normandie, France's sleek greyhound of the seas, made maritime history last week by being the first passenger ship to complete an east-west passage of the Atlantic in less than four days. But even as the world acclaimed this latest exploit of what, on the record at least, is the world's fastest ship, the United States Maritime Commission was announcing plans for the building of what it termed "the world's safest" one.

The new ship, bids for which are now being called, will be the long-awaited successor to the retired Leviathan. Although she will be the largest commercial ship ever built in this country, she will not be in the same class with her German-built predecessor, so far as size and weight go. She will be dwarfed even further by the Queen Mary, the Normandie and the new giants of the Italian and German merchant fleets. But into her will go details of design and material, according to the commission, which will make her the nearest approach to the non-burnable, non-sinkable vessel that engineers dream about.

Largest for America

The vessel will be 723 feet long with a displacement of 34,000 tons and a 22-knot speed. Thus she will be in the same general size class as the Paris and the Roma. She will be considerably larger than the George Washington and the Manhattan, now the largest American entries in the transatlantic ferry service. Her breadth of 92 feet indicates that she will run to stability and comfort rather than to rakishness in design.

The ship was designed by the technical staff of the Maritime Commission in consultation with other Government experts and a group of shipbuilders. In a sense, however, she will be international: her hull and superstructure will be the repository of every safety device that has proved its worth on the ships of all nations. In addition, the lessons of the Morro Castle and the Mohawk—the first was destroyed by fire and the second crashed and sank—will be built into her every plate and rivet.

Ordeal By Fire

Despite the fact that she is, as yet, only a series of blue prints, the ship has already gone through an ordeal by fire and has come out unscathed. Said the commission in announcing plans for her construction: "The ship will be constructed throughout of fire-resisting material in accordance with the recommendations contained in the recent Senate Safety at Sea report which resulted from the investigation of the Morro Castle and Mohawk disasters."

The report was the work of the Senate's Commerce Committee and embodied the results of an eighteen-month investigation into fireproofing materials by a group of experts. The investigation was not academic. The experts boarded an abandoned war-time hulk, the steamship Nantasket anchored in Virginia's James River, and turned her into a floating laboratory. Lining her staterooms and bulkhead with various types of fire-retarding and fireproof materials, they set fire to her a hundred times, even setting off explosions on her decks.

The Use of Asbestos

Out of these experiments came a new concept of what the ideal fire-resistant material is like. Materials which worked well on land proved unsuitable for ships because they were too heavy, too expensive or gave off noxious fumes when heated. The experts found that asbestos, in various forms, best met the most stringent tests.

The materials—and the principles of design—which stood up best in the blazing heat of the Nantasket experiments will be used in the construction of America's new vessel.

In planning for the proposed vessel's buoyancy and stability, the commission sought two objectives: First, to make sure that she would not sink with a hole in her hull; second, to provide such stability that even when she is partly flooded she will not capsize in a heavy sea or when under tow.

Fireproofing and stability insurance are means of preventing emergencies. But the commission is taking no chances; the ship will be equipped with the latest and best types of emergency devices.

Using these safety factors as a foundation, as it were, the commission plans to build a fast, luxurious liner capable of carrying about 1,200 passengers and a crew of 630.

Murphy Finds Roosevelt Is Showing Gains

N. Y. Herald Tribune

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Aug. 7.—Governor Frank Murphy of Michigan, in an interview today said that President Roosevelt was "stronger than ever" and that there was "appreciable sentiment for a third term for the President."

"Defeat of President Roosevelt in his Supreme Court reform program was not a serious setback with the American people," Governor Murphy said. "The President is as strong as he has been since election. There are some in the country who have been doing some wishful thinking that his popularity is waning. He is going even stronger. Nothing is more admirable than his courage and boldness in trying to help the people. The duty of government is to try to be helpful to the people."

Beyond saying that in his opinion support for a third term for the President is "appreciable," the Governor declined to discuss 1940 prospects. He stressed the need for "peaceful and friendly" settlement of labor troubles and pointed to increased employment in Michigan.

"This could not have happened," he said, "except for settlement of differences on a peaceable and friendly basis. There have been minor flareups, but they are natural, merely on adjustment. No lives were lost and no liberty suppressed. Neither was necessary."

Asserting that the Democratic party must be "progressive," the Governor said "a progressive party is one devoted to meeting changing social and economic needs of the people through government."

Of Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg he said "everybody in Michigan regards him highly. I believe he is one of the ablest leaders in the Republican party."

Governor Murphy was guest of Archibald McNeil, former Democratic National Committeeman, at a lawn party at the McNeil home. Guests included Governor Wilbur L. Cross and Mayor Jasper McLevy, Socialist, who formally welcomed the Michigan Governor to the city, and 250 others, chiefly state officials and prominent Democrats.

Notable for their absence were Mayor Thomas J. Spellacy of Hartford and his colleagues in the State Democratic organization. Mr. McNeil said Mayor Spellacy, who has been a leader in opposing the President's Court plan, had not been invited. Senator Augustine Lonergan wired his regrets at being unable to attend. He is an opponent of the Court plan and reports have been current in state political circles that today's affair was the beginning of a drive by Mr. McNeil for the Senatorial nomination in 1938 with New Deal support. No statement was forthcoming on this, however.

of the principle of the sanctity of treaties."

Britain in "Full" Accord

Greatest significance appeared to be attached to the statements made on behalf of Great Britain, France, Russia and the governments in the "Oslo group" that has already worked out an economic accord in Europe.

The British Foreign Minister expressed to the American Ambassador "full agreement with the expression of opinion" contained in the Hull statement "on international problems and situations both in the political and economic field."

"Mr. Hull's views on the ever increasing need for the preservation of peace, the vital importance of international cooperation in every sphere, and the methods which are recommended for obtaining these objectives are shared in common by his majesty's government in the United Kingdom," this message said.

The French Minister, in subscribing to the principles of the Secretary's statement, emphasized the need for solidarity between all nations; moderation in the realm of international and national affairs; non-interference in the internal affairs of other nations; the settlement of differences by negotiations and peaceful agreements; the carrying out of international obligations in a spirit of justice, mutual helpfulness and reconciliation; the restoration of economic stability in the world; and a lightening of the burdens which armaments impose.

Russian Approval

The Russian Foreign Minister found that the Secretary's statement was in accord with the general position of the Soviet government with respect to the questions touched upon. Tension, conflicts and frictions in international relations, although at first affecting only two or a few powers, he agreed, are likely eventually to affect the rights and interests of all nations. The Soviet government underscored the Secretary's points dealing with the abstinence of all nations from use of force in pursuit of policy; abstinence from interference in the internal affairs of other nations; adjustment of international problems exclusively by processes of peaceful negotiations and agreements; the faithful observance of internatioinal agreements; the modification of the conditions of treaties only by amicable agreements of the interested powers; equality of all nations, and disarmament.

Among the "Oslo Group," Belgium expressed readiness to cooperate with a view to attainment of the ends projected by Mr. Hull, and the Netherlands described the statement as "particularly valuable because it strikes a happy medium between the respect due to established rights and the heed to be paid by any statesman worthy of that name to new forces in the international field." Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland likewise expressed full agreement, in more or less detail.

"Accept (etc.).

And whereas, it is provided in the said agreement that the agreement shall come into force on the day of proclamation thereof by the President of the United States of America and of approval thereof by the Soviet of the People's Commissars of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and that such proclamation and approval shall take place on the same day.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, do hereby make known and proclaim the said agreement and, having been notified that the same has been approved on this day by the Soviet of People's Commissars of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, direct that it be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States of America on and from the date of this my proclamation.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this sixth day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-second.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State.

The Letters

Moscow, Aug. 2, 1937.

Excellency:

I have the honor to refer to our recent conversations in regard to the commerce between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and to ask you to let me know the value of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America which the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics intends to purchase in the United States of America during the next twelve months for export to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

JOSEPH E. DAVIES.

His Excellency Maxim Litvinoff,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Moscow.

Moscow, Aug. 5, 1937.

Mr. Ambassador:

In reply to your inquiry regarding the intended purchases by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United States of America in the course of the next twelve months, I have the honor to inform you that, according to information received by me from the People's Commissariat for Foreign Trade, the economic organizations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics intend to buy in the United States of America in the course of the next twelve months American goods to the amount of at least $40,000,000.

Accept, Mr. Ambassador, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

M. LITVINOFF.

Mr. Joseph E. Davies, Ambassador of the United States of America, Moscow.

4th Kuomintang Plenum Postponed Indefinitely

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SHANGHAI, Sept. 2—The fourth plenary session of the Fifth Central Executive and Supervisory Committees of the Kuomintang Party, which was scheduled to meet September 15 at Nanking, will be postponed indefinitely, it was officially announced.

Decision to put off the plenum is attributed in well-informed quarters here to the fact that a number of Chinese Government leaders have fled from Nanking because of repeated Japanese air raids and will not come back even if summoned by the government.

Iceland Prepares

bombing plane, becomes the symbol of strength of the new Iceland of the future.

Everywhere the new social ideals expressed through cooperatives and State control are gaining ascendancy. The cooperatives, originally not political, have become a political power only through the fact that their program more or less has coincided with that of the more radical party groups.

Among foreign trade interests, Germany seems to have captured a dominating position, partly through her system of barter instead of cash payments, which makes her a leading importer. The markers in Spain have been disrupted by the civil war, but Iceland now looks to South America for new possibilities. British activity is marked, both in trade and in the large numbers of tourists who come for salmon fishing and mountain climbing. Of late Sweden has begun to show a marked interest in Iceland.

Except for transatlantic liners calling here for a day or two, there is a noticeable lalk of American interest. In time Iceland may become a significant way station on the northern airways between America and Europe.

Manila Japanese Donate ¥900 To US Refugees

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

MANILA, Sept. 2—The Japanese Residents' Society here today donated ¥900 to console the American refugees from Shanghai, whose number has reached about 1,000. The sum has been collected from among the Japanese residents here.

Greatly appreciating the kindness of the Japanese residents, Mr. Paul McNutt, American High Commissioner here, sent a cordial letter of thanks to the president of the Japanese Residents' Society today.

Senator Bingham Sees No Neutrality Possibility

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 2—Terming the Neutrality Act as "foolish" legislation, Senator Hiram W. Bingham, Republican of California, who had strongly opposed its passage by Congress, declared in an interview with the press here today that the United States Government dare not invoke the act in connection with the current Sino-Japanese hostilities.

"Our country," he declared further, "would ally itself with Japan in the Pacific and with Great Britain in the Atlantic, if the law is carried into action by President Roosevelt."

Washington Probes

was hailed this week by some observers as "unique," it was looked upon here as closely resembling one of the major conclusions reached last year by Dr. Charles O. Hardy of the Brookings Institution in his book, "Is There Enough Gold?"

"We believe that, if the gold standard is restored, the objectives stated can best be achieved by the establishment of some plan under which a large part of the existing world gold stock would be segregated in extraordinary reserves," Dr. Hardy wrote.

"These reserves, which would not necessarily be under the control of central banks, would be drawn upon to take care of extraordinary transfers of balances from one country to another, but would not be taken into consideration in determining the credit policies of central banks and other monetary authorities in their attempt to control the volume of domestic credit."

"What is really needed, if the percentage reserve principle is to be retained," Dr. Hardy went on, "is a segregation of the gold stock into two parts, only one of which need grow by a given percentage in order to provide for an expansion of credit by that percentage; the remainder would be isolated from the reserve that controls ordinary credit policy."

Sterilization Policy Cited

Some Treasury officials have pointed out that this is exactly what this country is doing through its gold "sterilization" program, by which the Treasury, up to Thursday, had "sterilized" $1,239,229,420 of gold by placing it in an inactive fund.

The objection to the present policy, aside from its cost, has been that it lacks the international point of view which would be inherent in any such plan as the Royal Bank proposed.

For the United States to be the independent manager of this increasingly large block of the world's gold, according to some observers, might make for more of instability in world monetary affairs.

Others say that, because of natural draining of gold by the international movements which will come with changed conditions abroad, the large inactive gold fund will not be here long. The outward movement already has occurred to a slight degree in recent weeks.

It is strongly felt in Treasury circles that possession of the large gold fund is a decided advantage to the United States, not only because of the importance which it lends to this country in world monetary affairs, but because it provides a cushion against rapid movements of world capital.

In effect, it is a protection against "hot money."

One Detachment a Factor

Several other considerations indicate the difficulties in attaining the degree of international cooperation which would be necessary to carry out the gold reserve plan.

One is the historic policy of detachment of the United States from European affairs, somewhat weakened by the New Deal, but still an essential element in American thinking.

While the United States is not officially a member of the Bank for International Settlements, American bankers have served on its board and as its president, and some banking interests have owned its securities.

As a party to the tripartite agreement of last year, it is well known that the Treasury has been working in cooperation with British and French monetary authorities to achieve world stability.

Another difficulty is the controversy between world bankers on whether central banks should be controlled by their governments. Members of the independent school of foreign bankers have frequently criticized the strong ties between the United States Government and the Federal Reserve Bank. Arguments of this type, however, insignificant they may appear, do not promote accord.

More Battleships Sought By US Navy

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4—Funds for building two more 35,000-ton battleships are to be asked of Congress by the Navy Department in the Appropriation Bill for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1938, Admiral William D. Leahy, Chief of Naval Operations, announced today. Tentative construction plans also call for the building of two light cruisers of 7,050 tons each to replace ships of the Omaha class.

The battleships will be replacements for the oldest of over-age ships and increase to four the number of that class being built.

Plans are now being completed at the New York Navy Yard for the two battleships already authorized, the keels of which probably will be laid early next year. Their construction will mean employment for 5,000 men each at the New York and Philadelphia yards, where they are to be built.

Not Matching British Program

There were indications that the navy hoped to have Congress authorize two new battleships a year until replacements have been made for the fifteen battleships now in commission, as all are or soon will be overage, but there was no definite announcement to this effect.

Admiral Leahy said that the navy was adhering to its policy of building up to treaty limits and had not embarked upon a program of matching ship for ship, the new British program, which contemplates five new battleships.

Nor, he added, was it intended to recondition the old battleships as they are replaced, although it has been reported that Great Britain planned to recondition her old battleships.

The battleships to be replaced were not designated, but the oldest ones are the Arkansas, completed in 1912, 26,100 tons; the New York and Texas, each completed in 1914, 27,000 tons each, and the Oklahoma, completed in 1916, 29,000 tons.

Presumably the new cruisers will replace the Omaha and Milwaukee, both of which were completed in 1923.

Plane Carriers Are Delayed

Coincident with this announcement, Admiral Leahy revealed that the new 19,900-ton aircraft carriers Yorktown and Enterprise, which are being built by the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, would be delayed nearly a year in taking their places with the fleet, due to faults in the reduction machinery and minor mechanical repairs found necessary. The expense of replacing the reduction machinery and making the repairs to bearings, lubrication equipment and other parts, he said, would be borne by the shipbuilding company.

There was no question of sabotage, Admiral Leahy added, the reduction machinery having been found to produce excessive vibration and noise, and the other mechanical defects being of a minor character usually experienced in the building of all ships before they are finally accepted by the Navy.

The Yorktown was to have been completed on Aug. 16 and the Enterprise on Dec. 21.

The two carriers, authorized in 1933, were to cost $19,000,000 each.

High Standards Set for Ships

The two new battleships already authorized, the North Carolina and the Washington, which are to be built, respectively, at the New York and Philadelphia Navy Yards, will be of the most up-to-date character under the plans being drawn at the New York yard, the Navy Department said today.

"The quality of materials and workmanship will be fully up to the established naval standards, and every effort has been taken and will continue to be taken to improve present engineering practices wherever practicable," according to the announcement.

"The various navy yards and laboratories are conducting numerous tests and experiments to improve material and design, and the results of such tests will be worked into the design of the battleships, and also on other types of vessels under construction.

"Definite steps are being taken with the aim of getting fabrication under way early in 1938. If this can be accomplished, it will tend toward preventing further discharges of workmen at the two navy yards concerned, and also will open up work on the ships for the finishing trades at an earlier date than would otherwise be possible.

"It will also result in earlier placing of orders for raw and finished materials in the mills and factories throughout the country."

Bomb, Mine Protection Stressed

The department said that the most complete protection against airplane bombs, mines and torpedoes which can be devised will be provided in the North Carolina and the Washington.

"It is expected," the statement said, "that these two battleships will be at least the equal of any in the world with respect to this type of protection.

"During the past decade all large naval powers have conducted numerous experiments to determine the effectiveness of various types of protection against airplane bombs, mines and torpedoes.

"As a result of such experiments, the larger naval powers are satisfied that the up-to-date battleship is not more vulnerable to bombs, mines and torpedoes than to modern guns using high explosive charges.

"The decision of the Navy Department to proceed with the construction of battleships verifies the expressed opinion of experts of all the larger naval powers, that the battleship continues to be the backbone of naval power, regardless of the advent and improvement of important weapons, such as airplane bomb, the mine and the torpedo."

Bids were opened by the Navy Department today for the construction of four 1,600-ton destroyers in private yards. Six companies submitted offers ranging from $5,075,000 to $8,579,000, with the Bath Iron Works Corporation of Maine the lowest bidder.

The low bid compares with a low offer a year ago of $4,125,000 for a destroyer of about the same size.

The increased costs were attributed by the National Council of American Shipbuilders to the fact that the four now to be built are of somewhat different design, to higher costs of materials, to new requirements concerning installation of propelling machinery, and to advanced labor costs.

The bids submitted were:

Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Quincy—Fixed price: one destroyer, $6,230,000; each of two, $5,233,000; alternate bids: one destroyer, $5,905,000; each of two, $5,233,000.

Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company—Fixed price: one, $7,250,000; each of two, $6,500,000; alternate bids: one, $6,045,000; each of two, $5,420,000.

New York Shipbuilding Corporation, Camden—Fixed price: One, $7,644,000; each of two, $6,702,000. Alternate bids: One, $6,837,000; each of two, $5,877,0000.

Federal Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, Kearny—Fixed price: One, $8,579,000; each of two, $7,322,000. Alternate bids: One, $7,460,000; each of two, $6,230,000.

United Shipyards, Inc., 11 Broadway, New York City—Fixed price: One, $7,000,000; each of two, $6,250,000. Alternate bids: One, $6,450,000; each of two, $5,740,000.

Bath Iron Works Corporation—Fixed price: One, $6,200,000; each of two, $5,330,000. Alternate bids: One, $5,016,000; each of two, $5,075,000.

Italy Marshals New War Might In Sicily Games

N. Y. Herald Tribune

ROME, Aug. 8.—Fascist Italy's 1937 war machine, practicing secret maneuvers before the eyes of Premier Benito Mussolini and his key war chiefs in Sicily—the island, in brief, is the center of gravity of Italian military power because of its position between her conquered empire in Ethiopia and the mainland—displays radical innovations in military science and strategy.

Pilots from the air battles of Madrid and Bilbao, Blackshirts who drove Italy's powerful motor-mechanized units over rough Ethiopian and Spanish terrain, the infantry and cavalry proved not to be obsolete by the victories they have won for Generalissimo Francisco Franco in Spain, and sea captains who learned their lessons while patrolling the Red Sea and the Mediterranean during the Ethiopian war—all will combine to demonstrate what Italy has learned in the stern laboratory of two wars: the value of "guerra integrals," or complete mobilization of a nation's forces on land, sea and air.

The choice of Sicily, athwart the passage from the eastern to the western Mediterranean and dominating the entrance to the Tyrrhenian Sea, as the site for this year's maneuvers, emphasizes the new value placed upon Italy's "island of the sun" in the Fascist imperial scheme.

Maneuvers Are Warning

Maneuvers staged two years ago at Bolzana, the Italian industrial outpost blocking the vital Brenner Pass through the Alps and protecting the fertile northern plain, were an unmistakable warning to Germany that Italy was prepared to meet any threat in Central Europe despite her heavy commitments in East Africa, and that she could act just as quickly along her northern frontier in case of a new Nazi adventure in Austria as she did on that memorable morning of July, 1934, when Chancellor Englebert Dollfuss was murdered by the Austrian Nazis.

Last year's maneuvers held at Irpinia, three-quarters of the way down the peninsula in the heart of Italy, showed that Italy, her Ethiopian adventure accomplished and the importance of the Spanish war not yet realized at the moment, had an armed force pointed at no nation but ready to meet any nation.

Drastic reduction of man power per unit of arms this year reveals the triumph of that Italian school of military thought which has favored emphasis of mechanical power over purely human force. The motor-mechanized brigade of last year's maneuvers at Irpinia has given way to an ultra-modern armored brigade utilizing medium and heavy tanks of surprising speed which Fascist military experts believe capable of piercing enemy lines at vital points.

The 'Binarial Division'

Mussolini's most radical experiment this year is the use of the "binarial division," which utilizes more arms per head of infantry while cutting down the number of regiments of infantry compared to each regiment of artillery. In 1918 an Italian division included four regiments of infantry to one of artillery. Today for the first time in the history of military science Italy presents an army in which the infantry-artillery-ratio is cut to two to one. This increases attacking power in conjunction with the armored brigade and permits a speeding up in tactics of concentration hitherto unachieved.

These innovations confirm the Fascist pre-supposition of a short, hard war in which all available human and material resources will be mobilized in a concerted push for a rapid decision. Mussolini's recent great drive for economic self-sufficiency is designed to sustain over a short period a nation weak in steel, natural fuels and many other vital war materials, and emphasizes the threat of a long-drawn-out war to a nation dependent upon a Mediterranean life-line which can be closed at either end, at Gibraltar and Suez.

Maneuvers in North, Too

Cooperation of the navy in this week's Mediterranean maneuvers, with powerful units of the fleet covering the disembarkation at a point on the west coast of Sicily of a "red" attacking force against a weaker "blue" defense, manifests Italy's preparedness against the ever-present threat of a sea invasion, and implies that Fascism is ready to meet any threat from a coalition of Mediterranean powers.

While all Fascist propaganda weapons focus attention on the Sicilian maneuvers and strive to impress every Italian with the new political and strategic importance of the Mediterranean island and its peoples—long belittled by northern Italians—Fascism's northern boundary is not forgotten. Despite the much vaunted Rome-Berlin axis, complementary maneuvers in which a number of units took part have just been staged on the Veneto plains, where Italian forces met their most crushing World War defeat at the hands of the Germans and Austrians, and where they later made the remarkable stand at the Piave.

Washington Rejects Pan-American Resolution

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

WASHINGTON, Sept. 4—Declaring that acceptance would be a violation of the spirit of the Inter-American treaties, concluded at Buenos Aires last December, the United States government today formally rejected the Uruguayan proposal for Pan-American recognition of the Franco government in Spain.

Chile, the first and only other country to reply to the confidential note sent to all the American Powers on August 27 by Uruguay, accepted the proposal. Replies from the other American nations are expected shortly.

World's Great Eye Slowly Emerging

N. Y. Times

PASADENA, Calif., Aug. 14—Guarded and nursed as though it were the Holy Grail of old, a gigantic disk which scientists have termed "the world's most valuable chunk of glass" is slowly being transformed into the precious mirror which, three years hence, will rest atop Palomar Mountain as the seeing eye of the world's largest telescope.

Bit by bit, and inch by inch, eight highly trained young men in the optical shop at the California Institute of Technology are shaving particles of glass from the face of its 16¾-foot diameter. The grinders are patient. They have another two years of work before their mirror is completed, its precision-molded surface tested and countertested.

And on Palomar Mountain, 167 miles away, engineers are working with equally careful intensity on the mechanical superstructure which will house the 200-inch mirror, as well as the telescope proper, the dome, and the myriad intricate devices that will comprise the observatory.

On the rails of the telescope's base they are driving an immense steel crane and polishing rails so that the revolving superstructure may slide freely and unhindered when astronomers begin scanning the heavens with the new apparatus some time in 1940. For the stupendous mounting of the 200-inch lens must slide around on this circular base, which is 135 feet in diameter, with all the smoothness of a ball of quicksilver rolling on plate glass.

Face Grinding to Start in Fall

But it is in the rigidly policed optical shop at Caltech that the soul of the entire project—the "eye"—abides. Today the scientists disclosed that so far they have ground away two inches from the mirror, amounting to some 5,000 pounds of glass, and as yet they are only beginning.

By next October, it is hoped, the more exacting task of grinding out the face will begin. Henceforth, no one can obtain permission to enter the huge grinding room except the actual workers. The astronomers are not joking when they say that a single hard particle of dust brought in by a visitor might ruin the work of nine years.

The grinding tools—there are many sizes of them—the disks surfaced with hard glass facets. A steel shaft revolves the grinding disks on the surface of the cherished "eye." The grinding disk, its upper surface dotted with funnels, lies flat on the big glass eye. Both revolve, and the grinding disk describes a sort of orbit around the center of the 200-inch disk.

Watchful and unhurried, a workman is constantly astride a support just above the revolving mirror. Every few seconds, he pours liquid from a long-handled dipper into the funnels atop the grinding disk.

It is this liquid, a solution of carborundum, which is the abrasive. Alternately with the application of the carborundum, the workman plays a stream of water on the surface and washes the mixture of carborundum and newly ground glass from the mirror.

Eventually the disk will resolve itself into a parabolic mirror, that is, a concave surface that reflects incoming parallel light rays back to a focus.

The grinding and testing room must never vary in temperature more than 1 degree Fahrenheit, because heat expansion might throw angle calculations awry.

Preliminary grinding has disposed of the first phase of the cutting-down process. The face and the back surface have been smoothed, pockets are being ground for the supporting mechanism, and work on the front surface is about to begin.

Starting with coarse carborundum powder, the job at this point will be to shape the mirror face into part of a perfect hollow sphere.

As soon as the spherical shape is attained, the 200-inch glass will be polished and used to test the 120-inch flat mirror, processed two years ago, to serve as an artificial star in the final tests of the big mirror. Then will come the last tedious labor of converting the mirror from spherical to parabolic form, coating it with aluminum, and adjusting the numerous auxiliary mirrors that will comprise the finished product.

Responsibility for the careful work now being done rests with Dr. John A. Anderson, an official of the Mount Wilson Observatory.

Two years ago, when the project reached the stage when the actual building of the telescope was in the offing, Captain Clyde McDowell, U. S. N., long experience in building war vessels, was borrowed from the Navy to serve as supervising engineer and general coordinator of construction. It is his job to see that the dream which began nine years ago with a $6,000,000 grant from the Rockefeller Foundation culminates in the presence of the assembled telescope atop Palomar Mountain.

Design of the mechanism of the telescope and the dome is in the hands of Professor Russell W. Porter of the Caltech faculty.

Licensing Brings Rise In Gambling In Great Britain

Christian Science Monitor

LONDON.—Returning prosperity in Britain has been accompanied by a "corresponding increase in the activities of the agencies engaged in the exploitation of the gambling passion, with a consequent increase in the amount of money diverted from fruitful social purposes to the wasteful pursuit of gambling," according to the National Anti-Gambling League here.

In its annual report released here in June, the league draws attention to the fact that the licensing of the totalizator on British dog tracks has resulted in a great increase in betting on these tracks.

"The irony of this," it says, "is that this licensing was authorized in an act of Parliament designed to restrict betting facilities on dog tracks." The league also recalls that the Royal Commission on Betting and Lotteries in 1933 recommended that the tote should not be permitted on dog tracks.

Dog-Race Attendance Up

Since the passing of the Betting and Lotteries Act of 1934—some of the provisions of which were designed to restrict betting facilities on dog-racing tracks—attendance at the tracks of the Greyhound Racing Association Trust Ltd., increased from 3,277,944 in 1935 to 3,344,949 in 1936. Dividends on the ordinary shares were 10 per cent in 1935 and 30 per cent in 1936. The trust is one of the largest of the dog-racing combines.

At the annual general meeting of the trust held recently, the league's report states, Major-General Lord Loch, the chairman, declared that "the profits they had earned for the past year were the highest they had earned in the nine years since the company was incorporated. With reference to the coming year he was optimistic. The business was on a more stable basis than at any previous period and they stood further ahead in the sporting world than they had ever done."

Dog-Racing Called New Vice

It is now recalled that when the Betting Bill was discussed in Parliament, Sir Basil Peto said: "I believe dog racing is a new vice, and not a sport at all, and that it will increase under the provisions of the bill because they allow totes to be operated." Sir Alfred Butt said: "We are legalizing gambling and we are going to allow the profits of legalized gambling to go to private enterprise." Even the Home Secretary said. "I am well aware that by giving the totalizator to the tracks we are conferring an immense benefit on the management."

In Youth and Gambling, released here by the British Christian Endeavor Union, Mr. John Gulland states that "a prominent betting man estimated that the amount of totalizator betting on dogs on tracks affiliated and not affiliated to the Greyhound Racing Society was £47,000,000." There are over 20 licensed dog tracks in Britain, each with 108 race meetings in the year.

The Anti-Gambling League's report welcomes the increased activities of the police against gambling. There are, however, many anomalies in the administration of the law against what the Lord Chief Justice has called "these mischievous pests"—in particular in regard to gambling machines.

Promoters of football pools are showing increased activity. The secretary of a London County Council After-Care Center, it is reported, recently received a circular offering agencies for the collection of football coupons on attractive terms.

Atlantic Traveler Can't Yet Rely On 4-Day Schedule

Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK, Aug. 10—Trans-Atlantic speed records have been falling rapidly during competitive voyages by the Normandie of the French Line and the Queen Mary of the Cunard White Star organization, all leading to splendid advertising for ocean travel, but, in a practical sense, to scarcely any advantage in the saving of time for the average ocean traveler.

For example, the present record for the west-bound crossing was made on Aug. 1 when the Normandie passed Ambrose Light just 3 days, 23 hours and 2 minutes after leaving Bishop's Rock, on the southern coast of England but regardless of the extra show of speed the big vessel was not able to discharge her passengers until the usual time the the next day.

Little Advantage Seen

Rushing past Ambrose Light after covering the 2906 miles from Bishop's Rock at an average speed of 30.58 knots, the Normandie reached Quarantine Station here an hour or more after midnight, but did not proceed up the Hudson River until six hours later. Meanwhile, hundreds of passengers were asleep in their staterooms, scarcely any better off insofar as time was concerned than if they had been several hours out in the Atlantic.

The inevitable conclusion in shipping circles is that until the steamship companies are able to chop off substantial amounts from the trans-Atlantic schedules and land their passengers on the night of arrival here, instead of the following morning, little practical advantage accrues from the extra speed. For under present conditions the passenger from Europe must still count on landing in New York on the fifth day of his trip after a voyage marked by additional vibration from the ship's engines because of the attempt to make maximum speed.

Aim Is 4-Day Crossing

Looking back over the steady decline in time required for the North Atlantic passage, it is apparent that the steamship companies have been working for years to eliminate the firth day from the trip. They have not succeeded as yet, but the fastest vessels now discharge their passengers in the morning of the fifth day rather than in the afternoon or evening, and it is believed that the day is not far distant when the faster time will have been achieved, permitting passengers to disembark before midnight of the fourth day.

Canada Recovery Pace Slower But Trade Tops 1936

Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK.—Virtually all Canadian indexes have continued to show wide gains over the levels of a year ago although the rate of recovery has slackened in recent months, says the Standard Statistics Company.

In spite of this slackening, future prospects are favorable for the continuation of the present trend toward increased industrial development. For the time being, moreover, Canadian industry is relatively free from the labor difficulties which have disturbed American business.

Building Increases

As has been the case in the United States, building construction, while still at low levels relative to the previous peak, has shown particularly noteworthy gains. Although this tendency has been most marked in the industrial field, residential construction has been stimulated by loans granted under the Home Improvement Plan.

Some further seasonal recession in various lines is to be expected. However, notwithstanding unfavorable wheat prospects in the Prairie Provinces, there is little doubt that the aggregate value of industrial and agricultural production in 1937 will be substantially in excess of that of the previous year.

In common with other raw material producing countries, Canada is benefiting from the rise in world demand and prices for primary commodities. This, together with internal improvement which has resulted in a rising tide of imports has been reflected in substantial gains in foreign trade.

Export Outlook Better

The present export outlook is improved by the growing world and Empire sentiment for promoting a greater international exchange of goods and the definite assurance on the part of Washington and London that there will be no early change in the price of gold. The Imperial Conference resulted in no immediate commitments with respect to Empire trade relations, but the exploratory conversations of the delegates paved the way for a greater degree of cooperation in removing trade barriers.

Canadian exports account for approximately 38 per cent of total national income, and the outlook for further improvement in the value of foreign shipments is a definitely constructive factor.

War Stricken Spain Locale Of New Drama

The drama of war-torn Spain has been made the background for a powerful motion picture plot by Paramount Pictures in "The Last Train From Madrid," the star-studded drama which opens Sunday at the Nippon Gekijo.

With a capable cast of players headed by Dorothy Lamour, Lew Ayres, Gilbert Roland, Karen Morley, Lionel Atwill and many other skilled players, "The Last Train From Madrid" is the story of ten persons, most of them unknown to each other, whose lives are suddenly thrown together and their destinies worked out during twelve feverish hours in Madrid while the city is under heavy bombardment.

The story centers upon an incident in the Spanish War which took place last winter. During one of the battles the railroad connecting Madrid to Valencia, referred to as "Madrid's life line," had been cut, isolating Madrid from the outside world. A few days later the line had been repaired and the government announced that certain persons would be permitted to leave the city on the first train out which was also to be the last train from the stricken city.

Foreigners, persons on governmental business, correspondents and carefully chosen civilians were to be permitted to leave on this train providing they were able to give the government good reasons for it. The story begins with the announcement that the line had been repaired and that the train would leave in twelve hours.

A pass is secured for Miss Lamour, sweetheart of Anthony Quinn, a lieutenant in the army. He also arranges to get his friend, Gilbert Roland, out of the city. It soon becomes apparent that Roland and Miss Lamour are old sweethearts who are still very much in love. Despite this, Quinn permits them to go, hoping the girl will make her choice once she reaches safety.

Undercurrents in the plot are supplied by Karen Morley, an adventuress, who is in love with Roland, and who also has a pass to leave on the last train; Lew Ayres, an American newspaperman, who finds the love he had been seeking in the twelve feverish hours preceding train time with Olympe Bradna, a member of the Women's Battalion; Robert Cummings, a deserter and a coward who snatches at life in the few hours which remain for him and finds himself; Helen Mack, a street waif, and Lee Bowman, an adventurer.

Egypt Seeks End

found that the net revenue available for distribution among the beneficiaries becomes inadequate, especially in the case of ancient Wakfs.

Considerable opposition is anticipated in carrying through the abolition of the Wakf system, especially from the conservative element, at the head of which is Prince Omar Toussoun and the Rector of the Azhar, the great Moslem University of Cairo.

Yet the Wakf system, though bound up with Moslem law, was abolished entirely by the Prince's great-grandfather, Mohamed Ali Pasha, founder of the present Egyptian dynasty, though it was reinstituted by his successors.

The greatest opposers, however, are expected to be the lawyers who make their living out of the innumerable claims arising from such trusts.

Social and Personal Notes

Miss Sai Shoki, the famous Korean dancer who is to leave Japan shortly to make a tour of Europe.

TO TOUR EUROPE

Miss Sai Shoki, well-known Korean danceuse, will leave Tokyo shortly on a dance tour of Europe. Prior to that, she will give a series of dance recitals at the Tokyo Gekijo, on September 27, 28 and 29. Several new creations will be performed by Miss Sai Shoki and her pupils.

In the past years, Miss Shoki has made a great success with her characteristic dances, which are quite distinguished features in the world of dancing in Japan. Her dances have a strong local color and unique rhythm and movement in comparison to that of the Japanese dance. She is always attempting to create original Korean dances, adopting the classic dance and music of Korea.

The program for the farewell recitals includes the following features. (1) Dancing Girl, (2) From Mt. Tar, (3) Dance of the Shiragi Palace, (4) Brilliant Spring, (5) Song of Ariran, (6) Mt. Kongo, (7) Pioneer, (8) Oriental Rhythm, (9) Hunter of Kokuri, (10) Batallion, (11) Tenka Taishogun, (12) Dance of the Flute, (13) Two Korean Melodies, (14) Boy with Straw Hat, (15) Wallpainting at the Rakuro Ruin, (16) Sword Dance, (17) Dance of Miko, (18) Etude No. 1, (19) Korean Duet, (20) Korean Dance, (21) Dance of a Priest, (2) Eheya Noara, (23) Dance of King.

Some 17 dances will be performed at each recital. Miss Sai Shoki will give a matinee at 2 p.m. September 28 for the national relief fund for wounded soldiers and their families. The proceeds at the matinee will be donated to the Government.

Quick-Frozen Foods

ed refrigerator cars. It's all so finely timed and schedules are so meticulously adhered to that in the space of 300 minutes a growing pea finds itself riding an express freight.

The railroad cars are something out of the ordinary. Instead of the usual two inches of insulation, they are packed with eight inches of cold-conserving materials. They are generally kept at zero with dry ice—product of another depression baby industry. This refrigerant is gaseous carbon dioxide—collected mostly from the fermentation vats in distilleries—and compressed into a solid state.

Specially built trucks are likewise used for transport. These rumbling refrigerators also maintain zero temperatures and also use dry ice.

The big central warehouses, whither goes all this produce, present a curious spectacle. At the moment you are probably melting your collar and wilting your linen suit. Workers in a vast warehouse at Newark, New Jersey, which supplies metropolitan New York with quick-frozen foods, are shivering. They are wearing bulky sheepskin coats, woolen helmets, mittens and heavy socks and boots. Temperatures in the storage rooms that will be furnishing you out-of-season vegetables next winter vary between zero and ten below.

Preparing for the Lean Years

How long these products can be stored without losing their garden-fresh flavor no one knows. Recently a few executives of one of the larger companies had a luncheon of meats and vegetables that were packed in an experimental plant ten years ago. If the refrigeration temperature is lowered to—30 degrees F., there is evidence that the products will last indefinitely. At commercial temperatures used today two to three years seems to be about right.

Vitamins—those inestimably important dietary factors—apparently don't diminish in the vegetables. In some tests they have been found to run even higher than in sample vegetables taken from market stalls. Since vitamins aren't spontaneously generated by the cold, the only conclusion to draw is that the low content in the market samples was due to an overlong time gap between harvest and test.

There are 30-odd companies in the field and they are packing over fifty varieties of foods. Their fruits range from peaches to young berries; their meats from link sausages to beefsteaks. In the poultry line they pack broilers and turkeys and they can supply nearly any vegetable you can name. Plans are now being laid for a bigger 1938. In all likelihood packing will start shortly after Christmas in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands.

Potentialities can only be estimated. There seems to be no reason why a country with a war on the way couldn't stock prime vegetables to supply food needs for a period of years. Also, there seems to be no reason why Biblical rules of economy shouldn't be followed by stocking up in fat years with food to be eaten in lean years.

US Air Travel Up Sharply With Other Countries

Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON — Further growth in airplane passenger travel between the United States and foreign countries was shown during the fiscal year 1937 with 38,753 passengers arriving from abroad by air during the year, an increase of 10,168 passengers, on 26.2 per cent, over the total for the preceding fiscal year, it was announced by the Bureau of Customs.

Little change in the number of passengers arriving in the United States by air was recorded during the five-year period from 1930 to 1934. The pronounced upturn in 1935 was not continued in the following year, but in 1937 the number of passengers arriving in this country by airplane was almost double the average for the five-year period from 1930 to 1934 (19,378).

Florida Customs Busy

Almost three-fifths of the passengers reported (59 per cent) arrived in this country in the Florida Customs District. 22,861 passengers entering the country in Florida during the fiscal year 1937, as compared with 16,608 in 1936. Passengers arriving in districts adjacent to the Canadian Border numbered 8,501 during the past fiscal year, an increase of 65.7 per cent over the 5,131 reported during 1936. Particularly noteworthy gains were recorded in the Washington, Dakota and New York Customs Districts, the increases over 1936 amounting to 64.4, 81.2 and 56.9 per cents, respectively.

Along the Mexican Border, on the other hand, fewer passengers arrived in the United States by airplane during the fiscal year 1937 than during any of the preceding seven years, this being the only section of this country to show a decrease in airplane passenger traffic from abroad. The 4,358 passengers arriving by plane during the past fiscal year, while slightly smaller than in 1936, constituted a decrease of 32.9 per cent from total in 1935 (6492) and was less than half the number so arriving during 1930.

More Airplanes

The number of airplanes bringing passengers to this country from abroad, aggregated 5,802 during the fiscal year 1937, as compared with 4834 planes arriving during the fiscal year 1936, 6708 in 1931, and 7350 in 1930. The number of passengers carried per plane has risen to a marked degree during the past six years. In 1930 less than three passengers per plane were reported, while in 1937, the number of passengers averaged almost seven per plane, an increase of more than 100 per cent.

Roosevelt Seeks Balanced Budget

By JOHN H. CRIDER

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15.—President Roosevelt has conferred with Treasury officials in the last few days on the state of the Federal budget, leaving with them a strong impression that he is trying in earnest to accomplish his goal of a balanced budget in the present fiscal year.

Despite the shadows cast by a current deficit of $279,604,334, as of Thursday, and the fact that the national debt probably will pass the $37,000,000,000 mark this week for the first time in the country's history, Treasury officials regard the prospects for a balanced budget as bright.

Their hopes depend on a number of factors, principally that there shall be no unforeseen emergency expenditures and that business shall keep on the upward path. A great deal depends also on continued application of Presidential pressure on department heads to keep them under their budget estimates. On this score Treasury officials appear convinced that Mr. Roosevelt will prove relentless in his demands for economy.

For political reasons, if none other, it appears that department heads have every reason to play ball with their administrative leader in his objective of showing the nation that it can be done. The criticism heaped on the Administration for its huge annual deficits, renewed after the first month of this fiscal year, when the deficit habit appeared to be continuing, and the uncertainty caused in financial circles by Federal budgetary failures are believed to have had their effect.

May Hold Hearings on Outlays

In his budget estimate of April 20 the President predicted a net deficit of $418,000,000 for the present fiscal year, which started July 1. Already he has locked up $400,000,000 of department budgetary funds in reserve accounts under close scrutiny of the Bureau of the Budget. These funds may be drawn upon only with the approval of the bureau. It may even hold hearings to determine whether expenditures are justified. The reserves average about 10 per cent of appropriations.

It is apparent that if these funds could be left untouched, or used but slightly, and there should be a windfall of taxes in the Spring collections, a practical balancing of the budget would be achieved. Among the more optimistic Treasury officials there is some hope that the prediction of $6,648,432,000 of internal revenue receipts for the year may be exceeded.

Gold Flow a Major Factor

The Treasury's working balance was about $100,000,000 greater on Aug. 5 than on June 30 despite the purchase of $152,400,000 of gold and a budgetary deficit of $265,200,547 for the fiscal year to that date.

Much may depend on the flow of gold, and if predictions that the rate of incoming gold should decline do not materialize the Treasury and Federal Reserve may have to put into effect one of the many plans under discussion for relieving the Government of the irksome cost features of the present gold sterilization program.

However, if the gold flow does ease up, and revenues keep within estimates, it is held likely that the Treasury can get along without extra borrowing at least until the new financing to be announced Sept. 7.

In commenting on the current deficit of $279,604,334 on Thursday, the most recent date covered by Treasury statements, Treasury officials point out that two factors make this figure a bit misleading.

One of them is the fact that this is a poor time of the year for the income side of the Treasury's ledgers, the large revenues flowing from income taxes not being due until Sept. 15. The other is the fact that two trust account items—$41,000,000 for the old-age reserve account and $20,000,000 for the railroad retirement account—were placed on the expenditure side of the balance sheet for the current month.

NOJIRI NOTES

The Nojiri Lake community is gradually getting smaller and smaller. Every day the bathing pavilion is getting less and less crowded as the former summer holiday makers left Nojiri to start work again. Stunt night, which officially closed the Nojiri Lake Association, was held on Saturday night.

As usual the evening was a great success, and inspite of the lateness of the season, the program was attended to by a large audience. Miss Josephine Sawyer opened the program with a recitation entitled "George Washington." Dressed as an Italian immigrant and speaking with an accent Miss Sawyer recited her piece admirably. The next item was a Japanese dance by Miss Margaret Ann Buchanan, who was followed by an item of tumbling stunts directed by Mr. Percy Buchanan. Six boys, previously taught by Mr. Buchanan performed a variety of tumbling stunts. This ended the junior part of the program.

Mr. Boude Moore, then dressed in typical Nojiri golf clothes with a club and a ball, gave an amusing dialogue imitating various members of the community.

Mr. Glen Shaw was next. Every year Mr. Shaw's contribution to the program is one of the most popular. This year he seemed even more popular than usual. He appeared on the stage dressed in full evening dress except for his trousers! These were replaced by a pair of swimming trunks and the rest of his legs were bare. After a short speech he gave his celebrated "Abu Dance" in which he imitated a woman being bothered by an abu (horsefly), Mr. Shaw next sang a short song to the tune of "Dem Bones shall rise again" in which he detailed in amusing ryme, various events of the summer.

The rest of the program was under the leadership of Mr. Sullivan and was devoted to the "business" side of the evening. Mr. Downs first presented the junior awards. Polly Brady and Donald Nelson received prizes for boy's and girl's singles. Girl's doubles was won by Polly Brady and Margaret Mickle. Boy's doubles was won by David Coote and Donald Nelson. The prize for the Mixed Doubles went to Helen and Russel Durgin.

The golf prizes were given by Mr. Goldie, acting chairman of the golf committee since Mr. Stubbs departure. The women's 18 hole medal play was won by Mrs. Amos. Mr. Parker and Mr. Stubbs tied for the men's medal play so Mr. Parker will hold the cup for six months and Mr. Stubbs will then receive it. Mr. Forshee was the runner-up for this event.

Mr. Grant, commodore of the Nojiri Yacht Club, presented the sailing trophies. Erik Thorlaksson aged 17 was the high point man—winning two sailing races and two swimming races. His sail boat is the Viking and in it he won the Black Hawk Cup for A class boats and the Skidzu Cup for the boat scoring the highest number of points during the season. Commodore Grant also won two sailing races, the Board of Industry Tourist Shield and the Terry Cup. The Fair Skipper Cup was presented to Grace Bull, the Amos Cup for B class to Mr. Glen Shaw and the Degas won the Blue Nose Shield. The Harrison Relay Cup, given in memory of the late Mr. Harrison who was to have been commodore this year was won by Mr. Amos Mr. Watts and Mr. Johnson.

Swimming prizes were next awarded. Erik Thorlaksson won the Sim's Cup 100 meter free-style and the Men's Pentathlon Kobeya Cup. Miss Elaine Healy won the Womens Pentathlon and the Mary Wodswoth Cup Race (50 meter free-style). Ralf Felton the life guard, presented these awards as well as forty Nojiri "N" to the boys and girls who had worked for them during the summer. The other swimming awards included the long and short bars for long distance swims. The long bar is presented to those who swam to the village across the lake and the short bar was given to those who swam to the island which is a much shorter distance.

The last awards of the evening were the tennis awards made by Mr. Joe Mickle, chairman of the tennis committee. Mr. John Shively won the Japan Advertiser for Men's Singles for the second consecutive year. The Shively Cup was won by the Men's Doubles team of Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Joe Mickle. Mr. and Mrs. McAlpine won the mixed doubles match.

Threat To Beauty

under water and thus not visible from above.

"Engineers of both Canada and the United States agree that this work is necessary and that if it were extended to divert the current flowing to the American side it would not only provide additional water for power production but would preserve and protect the contour and beauty of the falls themselves," said Mr. Beiter.

The plan as described by the Representative is to put the weir across what is known as the Grass Island Pool well above the Horseshoe Falls in a curved line with the convex side upstream. In additon, several artificial cascades would be erected in the channels approaching the Horseshoe Falls "and some slight excavations" would be made on the flanks of these falls.

"This would result in the American Falls being well covered with water instead of sparsely covered as they are now. It would reduce the rapid erosion that is taking place in the Horseshoe Falls and it would make available an additional 20,000 cubic feet of water per second for power purposes."

Study Began in 1926

In 1926 an international board was appointed to study means of overcoming the erosion by works in the rapids above the Falls. A report was compiled and a convention and protocol drafted in 1929 calling for joint action by Canada and the United States. Both houses of the Canadian Parliament passed the measure, but the Senate Foreign Relations Committee took no action on it here beyond filing the report. The reason advanced for their action was that under the proposed convention power companies would do the work and receive in return additional water.

"Claims have been made that the Falls are not changing as fast as they appear to be," Mr. Beiter said. "Well, it was only a few years ago that tourists were permitted actually to walk beneath the arching waters of the American Falls, between the Falls and the wall of rock under them. Today, instead of arching in full volume out into the river, the waters drop down close to this wall and it is no longer possible for visitors to have that thrilling trip actually underneath Niagara Falls.

"Since 1931 there have been three slides of rock. On January 1, 1931, a slice 150 feet deep and 300 feet wide, estimated at 80,000 tons, fell into the river. Three years later 45,000 tons more dropped off, and three months after that another mass broke away close to the bank."

Water diversion would not stop erosion, Mr. Beiter admitted: but he said that the geological formation beneath the river near the crest of the falls indicated that a more resistant rock lay there and that erosion would be slower in the future.

While engineers have agreed that the construction of such weirs as Representative Beiter advocates would result in a more even distribution of the water, geologists who have studied the history of the cataract for years are emphatic in stating that there is no real danger of the Falls destroying themselves by erosion.

The mean annual rate of recession has been set at about five feet since 1764, at 3.7 feet since 1842, and at 2.3 feet since 1906. There is almost no recession on the part of the American Falls, and the Horseshoe Falls are cutting through the rock at a steadily decreasing rate. In the opinion of geologists this rate will continue to decrease.

They agree that all that is necessary to preserve the Falls is the proper supervision and control by the two Governments under which the erosion can be checked and the water so distributed as to cover once more the bared flanks of the Canadian Falls and to provide a more dependable flow over the narrower and higher American Falls.

President Roosevelt a few months ago said that he had in mind a new approach to the Canadian authorities concerning a power and navigation development which would include preservation of the Falls. He recalled earlier attempts at an agreement and said that it was clear that Canada was not interested in any arrangement which would not include development of additional water power.

Anti-Japanism In China Is Led By Communists

The present anti-Japanese movement in China has its source in the boycott of foreign goods which first broke out in China forty years ago in 1898, when the Chinese inhabitants of Ningpo, Shanghai, got into trouble with the French residents over the question of removal of the cemetery of their community and suspended business dealings with France. This was the first Chinese boycott of foreign merchandise.

America was the next to be pounced upon. Resenting the act of America in excluding Chinese immigrants by legal act in 1905, group of Chinese merchants in Shanghai took the lead in boycotting American goods and this anti-American boycott spread to Central and South China. This was the first nation-wide boycott of foreign merchandise to have occurred in China.

Next it was Japan that was made the target for outburst of Chinese anti-foreign selling and suffered a boycott of her goods at the hands of Chinese. The steamer Second Tatsu Maru of Tatsuma Company of Kobe, carrying arms and ammunition ordered by dealers in firearms in Macao, left Kobe direct for Macao but owing to inevitable circumstances put in at a Chinese port temporarily near Canton en route, when she was seized by a Chinese gun-boat and the captain and crew were taken to Canton for examination. The Japanese authorities made representations with the Chinese Government and the matter was settled through concession made by the Chinese side. At this, public opinion in South China rose against the Government for its alleged weak-kneed attitude and a boycott of Japanese merchandise was thus started.

Since that time, the Chinese have fallen into the habit of carrying out boycotts under the slightest provocation. From 1905 to 1931, Chinese anti-foreign boycotts occurred as often as eleven times, once against America in 1905 and once against Britain in 1925. All the other boycotts were directed against Japan, on such occasions as the presentation by Japan of the Twenty-One Demands to China in 1915, the Shatung affair in 1919, Japan's military expedition to Shantung in 1927, the Tsinan affair in 1928-29, the Manpaoshan affair and Manchurian Incident in 1931, etc. These boycotts lasted from several months to a year and a half.

Such anti-Japanese movements in China have become more serious and violent in nature, especially since the Manchurian Incident. For instance, in such agitations, Chinese merchants found dealing in Japanese goods or suspected of doing so, were put in a cage and were exposed to public view. In another case, such Chinese were bound hand and foot and were dragged about through the streets. Besides, a whole gamut of measures have been taken to put anti-Japanese ideas into the heads of the rising generation on a fairly systematic method.

Comintern first extended its tentacles of activity to China a considerable number of years ago when an anti-imperialistic movement was started in that country. It is thus quite apparent that since that time it has been at the back of the anti-Japanese movements carried on in China, it having maneuvered in collusion with the Chinese Communist Party, its agent. For example, on the occasion of the general labor strike in Shanghai in May, 1925, Comintern took an active part in it to lead the strikers by organizing a strike committee. The original intention of Comintern in China was militant. To be more precise, its first intention was to reinforce and strengthen the Chinese communist army and after extending the Soviet spheres through its maneuvering to overthrow the Kuomintang Government.

This principle of Comintern, however, was obliged later to be dropped due to the strong anti-communist campaigns undertaken by Chiang Kai-shek. Thereupon, Comintern adopted a new policy of first winning the masses of people over to its cause and then bringing pressure to bear upon the Kuomintang Government so as to force them to come to terms with it. It was from this very motive that it seized upon the popular anti-Japanese feeling running higher in China just at the time as a handle to win the hearts of the Chinese masses. As a matter of fact, at its seventh general meeting Comintern adopted a resolution in favor of organizing communist popular fronts all over the world, when, however, it took special care to decide that in China first importance should be given to organizing and leading the popular front with opposition to Japan as its primary object. Later in August, 1935, the Chinese Communist Party, under the inspiration and instruction of Comintern, issued a manifesto counselling the Chinese people with new lines of policy and strategy as a means of holding their own against Japan and of thus saving their own country from ruin. About a year later, that is, in June, 1936, an anti-Japanese popular front embodying elements of wide scope and various strata of society was brought into being in China. The important components of the Chinese anti-Japanese popular front are as follows:

Communist Party

The Chinese Communist Party has always been taking the lead in the anti-Japanese movement in China. Though at first it followed the principle of fighting imperialism in the world as a whole, it changed this principle and decided to direct the shaft of opposition to Japan only by letting alone the European imperialist countries or rather by shaking hands with them if possible. This change of policy was prompted by the North China Incident which took place in June, 1935, which it exploited to incite anti-Japanese feeling among the Chinese masses. It schemed to make terms with Chiang Kai-shek and this scheme was successfully carried out owing to the outbreak of the Sian affair. Opposition to Japan and fight with Japan are its motto, escutcheon, and means of livelihood. If it did not cry shame upon Japan from the housetop as if she alone were to blame, it would be unable to keep in existence. It has been simply instrumental in holding a public show of Soviet motion pictures to inspire communist ideas in the popular minds and in exciting anti-Japanese feeling in the masses by means of theatricals, songs, and others. It is now said that in connection with the present incident between Japan and China the Chinese communist army has been mobilized from Shensi, the base of its operation, to the battle front. If so, it appears it has now proceeded to act upon its professed program of decisive battle with Japan.

Simultaneously with the outbreak of the present incident with Japan, the Party started activity to establish connection between the Nanking Government and the Comintern. At the time, it transmitted the propositions of Comintern to Chiang Kai-shek offering to support the Kuomintang Government. It also proposed to organize a militia, to create disturbances in Japan, Korea, and Manchoukuo through collusion with the communists in these countries, and to bring about troubles in the Japanese cotton mills in China.

The Chinese Communist Party resorts to guerrilla warfare and is noted for its quick action. It makes nothing of committing ruthless, violent, and outrageous acts, namely incendiarism, looting, and massacre. Even international law and humanity are nothing in their eyes. For instance, it was responsible for the random firing upon the foreign settlement in Tientsin, massacre of Japanese residents in Tunchow, and the mad air raid upon the neutral zone in Shanghai in connection with the present incident between Japan and China. How fantastic is the idea of the Chinese communist party can be seen from the fact that it has openly declared that it expects to confiscate all the Japanese interests and properties, inclusive of banks, factories, mines, railways, ships, companies, and goods to the value of ¥2,000,000,000, to raise a fund by which to oppose and fight Japan. Nevertheless, Chiang Kai-shek is reported to have appointed Chu Te, leader of the communist party, as Commander-in-Chief of the First Route Army against Japan, and Mao Tuk-tung, also leader of the same party, as Vice-Commander of the same Army. Chiang has also given a pledge to it to provide a regular monthly allowance of 900,000 yuan for it as a war fund and has ceded more than ten prefectures around Shensi Province to it as places for the stationing of its troops.

It is estimated that the Chinese communist army had formerly a numerical strength of 200,000, inclusive of the irregular army. Unable to withstand the punitive campaign undertaken by Chiang Kai-shek against it with the government force of some 500,000, the main body of the communist army moved westward to Kansu Province last autumn of when it numbered about 100,000. After the Sian affair, however, it was reorganized into several divisions of the Kuomintang Government Army as a result of the compromise effected between the Kuomintang Government and the Communist Party in the spring of this year, when it is said its numerical strength was about 60,000. This seems to show that out of the 100,000 communist army only about 60 per cent were found qualified to be reorganized into the Government Army. The minor vanguard corps of the central communist army consists of boys aged from twelve to seventeen, while among the ordinary rank and file are very old men, the oldest being 67 years of age. Farmers occupy 58 per cent of the same army, wage laborers 25 per cent, industrial laborers 3 per cent, etc. Only 70 per cent of the men are provided with old-fashioned rifles, and it is exclusively officers that are provided with revolvers. The army has machine-guns and light field-guns. Red Army College is the highest military educational organ of the Communist Party. Of the students, 25 per cent are those aged between 18 and 22 and 25 per cent are those older than 30 years of age. Practically all the communist army is at present concentrated in Kansu and Shensi provinces, which are comparatively near Manchoukuo and Inner Mongolia. There is thus some possibility of it falling into collision with Manchoukuoan and Japanese troops. This deserves careful attention by all.

Air Base At The North Pole

Moscow Weekly News

It is well-known that there is no land at the North Pole. The Arctic Ocean at that point is covered all the year round by huge drifting ice floes.

Today four men are living on the ice floe closest to the Pole. They are the wintering party left there last May by Soviet fliers, and it is their intention to remain for a whole year, making thorough scientific investigations according to a previously prepared plan. Beside the regular reports sent by radio concerning weather conditions, the party also maintains an informal contact with short-wave amateurs on the mainland.

Aviation experts claim that regular flights across the North Pole from Europe to America are entirely feasible, considering that the distance from Rudolf Island, in the Franz Josef Archipelago, to the Pole is only about 560 miles, and from the Pole to Patrick Island in northern Canada, only 937 miles. It is for the purpose of obtaining meteorological and magnetological data necessary for the establishment of a polar air service that these four men now carry on observations in their strange habitat at the top of the world.

The thought of a flight to the North Pole occurred to the Soviet flier, Mikhail Vodopyanov soon after the Chelyuski nepic of 1932, when the ice breaker of that name made its daring voyage around the north shores of the U.S.S.R. from Archangel to the Pacific Ocean. The further speeding up of the conquest of the Arctic and the development of the Northern Sea Route would depend on greater precision in weather forecasts; and the North Pole was considered to be the "weather kitchen" for the whole Arctic basin.

After much study of Arctic and Antarctic exploration, Vodopyanov failed to gather enough information for a routine outline that would serve as a basis for a landing of a party at the Pole. Insted, he presented the technical aspects of the flight in the shape of a novel, "The Pilot's Dream," which has since won great popularity in Russia in its dramatized form. After discussion of the project with I.D. Papanin, the Russian flier who had been chief of a wintering colony on Franz Josef Land, it was decided that Rudolf Island must serve as a basis for the North Pole expedition; and at the beginning of last year Vodopyanov made an experimental flight to the island.

On his return, he was ordered to begin preparations for participation in a polar expedition to be organized by the Central Administration of the Northern Sea Route, and under the supervision of Academician Schmidt. The men chosen for the year's sojourn at the Pole were station chief I. D. Papanin, radio operator E. D. Krenkel, hydrobiologist and hydrologist P. P. Shirshov, and astronomer and magnetologist E. K. Fiodorov. Vodopyanov himself was among the fliers chosen to land the scientists at the Pole.

The four prospective winterers began at once to make the most careful and minute preparation. An experimental station, with all its equipment, was set up on a field near Moscow. The winterers lived in it for an entire week, checking up the work of the radio station, engines, stove, quality of food, clothing, and so on.

The four men, now at the Pole, wear silk underwear next the skin. Then comes woollen underwear; over that, sweaters of the finest merino wool; then leather trousers and leather shirts with flannel linings. Over that is worn furtrousers, made from the skins of young reindeer, and shirts of the same material. In additoin, they have long lambskin coats, lined with fox, with great fur collars.

On their feet they wear dogskin stockings over woollen socks, and boots of reindeer skin. In the event of "warmer weather"—the temperature even in spring drops to 22 degrees below zero F. they wear knee-high waterproof mountain boots; and for damp weather they have sealskin boots with fur inside and out. Moleskin masks protect their faces against the cold winds, and special goggles are used against the snow glare. Each man has a reindeer sleeping bag, lined with sateen, a detachable fleecy inner lining, and a pneumatic rubber mattress.

Food supplies presented a problem: they had to be nutritive, sufficient for a year, and the entire amount to be carried by only three airplanes in a single flight.

The Moscow Engineering Institute of the Food Industries worked out the recipes. Most of the foods are in the form of cubes, weighing 50 to 60 grams, which can be made into tasty, nutritive soups, gruel, stewed fruit, chopped meat, and other dishes. A full meal, of several courses can be prepared from these concentrated foods in from three to five minutes.

Five thousand chickens were used to prepare 660 lbs. of the chicken powder supplied to the expedition. The entire provisions occupy 70 to 80 sealed metal boxes, and the food is not affected by the cold. Each box contains enough food to feed four people seven days.

Among the food novelties is a special Arctic biscuit, containing 35 per cent chicken-meat and beef. Another is a slightly salty chocolate—ordinary chocolate has been found too sweet for the Arctic—which contains, in addition to the cocoa bean, protein, animal fats, and chicken-meat.

But the first necessity for life at the Pole is shelter. A "house"—essentially a tent—was built of duraluminum to the size 11 x 7.5 x 6 ft. The outer envelope is made of a special material consisting of four layers. The first, or inner one, is of waterproof rubber, while the next two are of silk, quilted with eiderdown. The top layer is of strong canvas, painted black, so that the tent may be best heated by the rays of the sun. Two windows with unbreakable glass are built into the walls. The floor, 6 in. thick, is of rubber squares, which are really pneumatic rubber cushions. A large number of pockets, serving as shelves, are sewn on the inside of the walls.

For protection against the wind, a buffet is arranged in front of the tent. No matter how cold it may become outside, the temperature may be kept above 14 degrees below zero in the tent by the use of a little fuel.

The instruments used by the scientists had to be remodelled to make them smaller and lighter. Most of the instruments were made to work automatically.

The planes chosen for the expedition were of the four-motored ANT-6 type. Despite their enormous size, their capacity was strictly limited, and every ounce had to be accounted for. The "untouchable" three-months' supply of provisions for the crew was highly concentrated. The navigators' cabins, set forward on the nose of the planes, were of unbreakable glass, both walls and floor. Each plane carried special bombs to test the strength of the ice.

The total weight of the wintering party, including the men, was set at nine tons. Three airplanes were required to carry this to the Pole. Another heavy plane was prepared, however, for reserve, as well as light and fast planes for weather observation. The aviators even went through a special preparatory training course.

Little was then known of landing conditions at the Pole; and a field of 700 to 800 square yards was required for the landing of the planes. Should nothing but rough ice have been found at the Pole, the entire equipment would have been lowered by special parachutes. The planes were fitted with skis; but their huge 6-ft. wheels were also carried for landing on their return.

First, it was necessary to organize a base for the expedition on Rudolf Island. Last August, the ice breaker Rusanov, loaded to capacity with provisions, with great difficulty broke through the heavy ice of Barents Sea, and got within two miles of the Island before being frozen in. The ice floes were blasted, and a road was built to the Island. With the aid of two tractors and a truck, the equipment was then landed. Two new houses of 10 rooms each were built; a cattle yard, a garage, a radio station, a bathhouse and warehouses were added, and a wintering colony of 24 men was left on the Island.

It is now known that the Soviet fliers had no difficulty in landing and taking off their heavy planes at the Pole, there being vast, even stretches of ice in the center of the Arctic Ocean.

Radiograms from the station have already proved that beneath the layers of cold water underlying the ice-floe, there are currents of slightly warmer water, indicating the influence of the Gulf Stream. Peculiar weather was reported on June 9: drizzling rain, which later turned to mist, followed by snow. On more than one occasion, birds have visited the North Pole station, upsetting the scientific belief that no life existed above 84 degrees N. lat.

The men's time on the ice is crowded with important work: carrying on meteorological observations, measuring air temperature and humidity, measuring the power and direction of the winds, and the quantity of snow and rainfall. Shirshov is studying the depth, currents, and animal and vegetable life of the Arctic Ocean, as well as acting as physician to the party. Fyodorov, the astronomer and magnetologist, is collecting data for a magnetic chart of the Central Arctic, which does not yet exist. Such a chart makes it possible to fly in the polar regions without the necessity of finding one's bearings by the sun. Orientation by the sun makes it necessary to fly only above the clouds; but with a precise map of magnetic declinations, it will be possible to fly "blind"—with instruments alone.

Fyodorox will also make astronomical observations, and daily fix the coordinates of the moving ice floe. Finally, he will study the aurora borealis, and make drawings and photographs of it.

The radio operator has three transmission sets, the largest of 70 watt power, and the smallest, which is to be used for emergency, 10 watt. The radio station receives its energy from a small, wind-driven motor. Should it break down, a gasoline engine will be used, or even a hand dynamo.

In addition to their scientific equipment, the men are supplied with 3 rubber boats, 2 canvas boats, skis, sleighs, arms, and a large quantity of fuel. The several storage rooms are arranged 200 to 300 yards from each other so that, in the event of the ice pack breaking up, they may still have some provisions.

The Tokyo Museum of Science

The Tokyo Museum of Science is situated in Uyeno Park, Tokyo. This is one of the best equipped museums in this country. Many children and students visit the museum to study modern mechanical science and natural history. The exhibits at the museum include industrial sciences, mechanical science, zoology, mineralogy, botany, astronomy and meteorology. The museum is planning to enlarge the galleries until 1940 on the occasion of the international fair in Tokyo.

Scout Jamboree

organization has grown into a world movement, including boys of all classes from all nations, and prepares them to be good citizens and good men. May the days you are gathered here be marked by a new Scout spirit and may, through God's blessing, the friendships you form here strengthen and deepen into a true loyal brotherhood which will remain long after you have scattered back to your countries over all of the world. Herewith I declare the jamboree open."

Called "Junior League"

In replying Lord Baden-Powell said: "I am sure every Scout will carry home Your Majesty's message of encouragement and it will help them all to carry on the great work you are doing here and in the world. We are all greatly privileged to have our jamboree here in Holland—country of bold adventurers, great men who have achieved such success in art, commerce, industry and, above all, the land of many conferences and deliberations for bringing peace to this world. Today Your Majesty has given us immensee encouragement to go forward in our task in the Scout brotherhood which has now become a junior league. We hope, helped by the inspiration given us today, to develop that peace among nations which so far statesmen seemed to have failed to achieve through their discussions."

The United States Minister visited the Scout camp following the ceremony.

Neutral Stand Problem for U.S.

By JOHN T. FLYNN
Noted Economist

San Francisco News

NEW YORK, Aug. 13.—There seems to be some difference of opinion about the meaning of the word "neutrality" as China and Japan square off for a fight and America's neutrality is debated.

The dictionary offers some help. It defines a neutral as one who refrains from interference in a contest of any kind. Neutrality it defines as the state of being a neutral nation during a war in which states taking no part in the contest continue friendly relations with both belligerents.

Anyone will tell you that in this Chinese-Japanese contest we should remain neutral and anyone will tell you that we should stay out of the war. To remain neutral, therefore, means not to help China or Japan.

Issue Is Complicated

But helping China or Japan is a process we should be quite clear about. It is one thing to wish to help China or Japan. It is quite another for China or Japan to help themselves. If we say we are not going to help either belligerent, we are neutral. But if we say we are going to try to prevent China or Japan from helping themselves in some special way, then we have departed from neutrality.

For instance, we are not responsible for either nation. If Japan is strong and China is weak that is no part of our doing. If Japan has ships and China has none, we cannot help that. If, then, we say we are going to pay no attention to these disparities but let matters take their course, we will be neutral.

If Japan is stronger than China and more skilled in war, Japan will win, but this will be none of our doing. If, however, we reason thus—if we say Japan has ships, but China has none; therefore we are going to shape our policy in such a way as to counterbalance this advantage which Japan has, then we are no longer neutral, for we will be putting ourselves on the side of China.

Embargoes Provided

Being neutral does not mean that we must see to it that the two combatants are evenly matched in men, in ships, in ammunition. That might be the business of an umpire, but not a neutral.

Now we have a law which requires that as soon as war exists between two nations, the President must proclaim the fact and then, immediately, certain trade rules go into effect as against both the parties. This is not done to help or hurt either one, but to insure our remaining out of the conflict. This policy must be followed by the President regardless of the effect upon the war. The effect upon the war is not our business.

But if the President says—as he is reported to have said—that if he enforces our neutrality law the effect will be to enable Japan to enjoy the advantage of having a large merchant fleet which China has not, then he will be guilty of flagrant un-neutrality. He will be actually shaping our policy in order to deprive Japan of an advantage which she possesses. He will be actually refusing to enforce a law of Congress because it will have the effect of preventing one belligerent from enjoying the advantages which it possesses over the other.

Ticklish Problem

Americans may well fear the handling of the delicate interests of this country in the Orient if our policy is to be dictated by a desire to help China. Because that is not neutrality.

And if we are going to put ourselves on the side of China the President had better get a mandate from the American people, who will have to fight and pay for the war thus in the making.

Doctors' Dilemma Solved Finally By Babe's Death

Time (August 16)

In Philadelphia's General (charity) Hospital last week lay one Mary Bocassini, 27. She was about (1) to have a baby and (2) to die of tuberculosis. Her Roman Catholic husband resolutely cried: "If my wife must die, it is the will of God, and my baby must die ..... If one must die, both must die."

Mr. Bocassini, a sugar refinery laborer whose first wife died during a Cesarean operation, unwittingly disagreed with Roman Catholic canons. In accordance with canon law young Dr. John Corbit who had charge of Mary Bocassini's case, should, if necessary to save the child's life and soul, have delivered the child by Cesarean section. This would inevitably have caused the death of the mother and jeopardized young Dr. Corbit's promising career.

On the other hand, if Dr. Corbit waited for Mary Bocassini to die, the only way to deliver the baby would still be by Cesarean section. This introduced a problem in Common Law. Cutting her body post mortem might be construed as an autopsy. And Common Law forbids autopsy without the consent of the nearest surviving kin. Her husband objected.

Dr. Corbit's hospital superior asked advice of a Philadelphia lawyer, Assistant City Solicitor G. Coe Farrier, who has six children, one of whom he delivered himself because no doctor was handy. Lawyer Farrier believed that the husband's consent to autopsy was not essential in this emergency. A common pleas judge, Harry E. Kalodner, onetime reporter for the Philadelphia Record, concurred. Judge Kalodner called in the press to hear the following opinion:

"Thou shalt not kill is still the law of the land. If the doctors carried out the father's orders, it would be tantamount to condemning that unborn child to death. Such an operation might be considered in effect an autopsy, and I know there is a law which prohibits autopsies without the consent of relatives, in cases where there is no presumption or suspicion of crime. But that unborn child has legal rights, too.

"In law life begins at the moment a child stirs in the womb. At that moment the child becomes an individual with all the rights of a full-born infant. This has been the ruling decision in many cases. Unborn children have established their rights to legacies, have had guardians appointed and have instituted suits at law. In this case, however, it is the first time that the right to life has ever been presented to a court. In all the other cases life has been taken for granted, and property has been the issue.

"Under the laws which govern us, only the State has the right to take away the life of an individual. In reverse, this means that the State has an inherent duty to protect the life of an individual it does not wish to condemn."

Said Widower-to-be Dominic Bocassini: "They better not do anything to Mary while she lives. That's what I don't want." Dr. Corbit tried in vain to induce birth without surgery, by giving the comatose woman drugs. She died, still pregnant, but properly shriven, and within a minute Dr. Corbit had her abdomen open and a 3½-lb. girl in an incubator. The mother's temperature at death was 109.4 F., the baby's at birth 108 F. Within 24 hrs. this dropped to 100 F. In a nearby room was a woman who had just borne twins. One died, leaving an excess of breast milk which the post mortem baby could have.

Said Father Bocassin (who has a 12-year-old daughter who keeps house for him, a 10-year-old son in an orphan asylum, both by the previous marriage): "If the baby lives, the doctors will have to keep it. I got to work. I can't work and take care of a baby." This new dilemma resolved itself after 46 hours when Frances Mary Bocassini, as she was baptized, turned blue and died:

Motion Picture's First Publicity Man

The man whose genius for publicity made Douglas Fairbanks a national figure is now producing "Girl Loves Boy" for Grand National release. He is B. F. Zeidman, motion picture's first publicity man and the one responsible for the most amazing antics in press agentry!

When Zeidman was sixteen he had a job under D. W. Griffith when the latter was filming "Intolerance," and when he was still very young, during the World War, he became Doug Fairbanks' own particular publicity representative. In that capacity he staged a spectacular campaign during the time Fairbanks was campaigning the country in behalf of Liberty Loans. Zeidman believed Mary Pickford, Charlie Chaplin and Fairbanks, together, would sell considerably more if banded together than separately—and contrived that famous triumvirate which made screen history.

Zeidman laid out what he thought was the right kind of program, including parades, banquets, and other carefully staged stunts, and when they got to Washington Zeidman was waiting in the office of Franklin D. Roosevelt—who was then Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Previously Zeidman had received a telegram from Doug firing him, as he felt his campaign was too pretentious and in the way of becoming embarrassing. However, when Doug came in "Secretary" Roosevelt's office he slapped Zeidman on the back and nothing was ever again mentioned, either of Zeidman's campaign or his many dismissals, for the latter were as numerous as were his hair-raising ideas.

Now he has become a producer in his own right for Grand National, having already released "Sins of Children," with Eric Linden and Cecilia Parker, who are again to appear in his "Girl Loves Boy"—and he has plans for several other productions on the current program. Today Zeidman puts that same quality of enthusiasm and distinction into his producing as he did into those epoch-making stunts which has made him a life-long friend of the elder Fairbanks.

KIRIN BEER

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

War Phobia

the affairs of the Old Word.

War, generally speaking, is likely to come as the result of (1) some country's being driven to fight by a desperate emergency, (2) the deliberate policy of a country or group of countries, or (3) accident.

The desperate emergency most to be feared is, as has just been said, the economic one. Everybody is agreed on that. One of the few things upon which all Europe is unanimous is that Secretary of State Cordell Hull has got hold of the right end of the stick when he says that the greatest threat to world peace is the continuance of the present economic nationalism. But that does not mean that the threat is imminent, that the stories, for instance, that Signor Mussolini may soon explode under economic pressure need be taken seriously.

I asked a friend and adviser of Il Duce about them.

"Of course," the said, "the economic situation is difficult, but the idea that it is going to bring us to desperation for a very long time is ridiculous.

"Various factors help us. Now that times are better, the remittances from Italian emigrants in North and South America are extremely useful. So is the growing tourist trade. Our armament program will give work for some years more. Ethiopia is absorbing labor rapidly because we are carrying out our huge program of road building and construction with Italian labor rather than with native labor. And if we do have to tighten our belts, we have an advantage over you and the Americans in a far lower standard of living. Our people can be kept going on much less than yours."

Nor did Germany, in spite of the grumbling, look like an economic crash. There, too, armaments and a comparatively low standard of living help. No more than in Italy were there signs of depression or hard times, in spite of the grumbling of the business world. Both countries seemed to be full of prosperous people on carefree holidays, and their towns had lost the strained atmosphere of a few years ago.

1914 and 1934 Contrasted

As for a planned war or war from some accident, those two possibilities really go together, for, unless somebody wants war, the chances of an accident's producing one are small. The comparison between what happened in 1914 after the murder of the Austrian Archduke at Sarajevo and a year or two ago after the murder of the King of Yugoslavia at Marseilles proves that. Both crimes had all the makings of a European explosion. In 1914 the explosion came because some people wanted war. In 1934 nothing happened because nobody wanted war.

In 1937 the democracies are certainly as peaceful as ever, and, when one gets under the froth of their militant nationalism, there is good reason to believe that the dictatorships want to avoid war if they possibly can. In Germany the leaders of the army, whose influence is very great indeed, are universally believed to be pacific. Being scientific soldiers, they have no delusions about the suicidal destructiveness of modern warfare. Herr Hitler is quoted as frequently saying that, though he proposes to make Germany the strongest country in Europe, he hopes to be able to do it by peaceful methods.

Signor Mussolini is just as much a realist as any one else. Nor can he be judged by his inflammatory bombast. Italians are surprised when the outside world takes it seriously.

"Cannot you realize," they say, "that Il Duce has to do that sort of thing, that we Italians need a continual display of violent verbal fireworks if we are to pull ourselves together? But nobody hopes more than we do that his visions of war and glory will remain visions."

Last, but by no means least, the dictatorships, especially Germany, the dominating figure in their combination, are doing too well by diplomacy, backed by bluff and bullying, to be seriously planning to change their technique and challenge their rivals on the battlefield.

The object of that diplomatic game, as I have already said, is for Germany, the domination of Central and Eastern Europe, and for Italy the Mediterranean.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Lazy Bullet

Thomas Markovich and Frank Nahovic, both of Cleveland, had been friends for years, when suddenly Markovich suspected Nahovic of causing him trouble at home. Fearing the worst, and suffering untold mental torture, he went to Nahovic's home where a heated argument ensued. Markovich whipped out a gun, and pointing it squarely at Nahovic's head, he pulled the trigger. After the explosion, everyone cooled down, and the most puzzled of all was Nahovic, who found he was not even wounded. The bullet had lodged in the end of the gun barrel, with its nose slightly protruding. Arrests and police investigation followed, resulting in the case of Ohio vs. Thomas Markovich being "no billed" by the Grand Jury of Cuyahoga County, Ohio.

Otto Tells Of Bid

Hungary, dislocated the region's economic organization.

Were Otto to demand everything which monarchist leaders hold to be his "historic right," he would be asking for eight crowns. The old Hapsburg law of inheritance makes him "Emperor of Austria, Apostolic King of Hungary, King of Bohemia, King of Dalmatia, King of Croatia, King of Slavonia, King of Galicia, King of Lodomeria and Illyria." Another old title is "King of Jerusalem," but even the most enthusiastic monarchist makes no claims in Palestine.

Little Nations Divided

Bohemia has been absorbed in Czechoslovakia. Croatia is a part of Yugoslavia. Dalmatia has been divided between Yugoslavia and Italy, and the other kingdoms are now parts of Czechoslovakia, Poland and Rumania. So the only nations where a restoration of the Hapsburg monarchy lies within the realms of practical possibility are Austria and Hungary, with Austria the main hope.

The Austrian government, headed by Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg, announces at intervals that the question of restoration "is not actual." Officially, it has always been said that it is too soon to talk about recalling Otto.

but there is a real basis for uneasiness which has hitherto prevented anything like a full recovery of the Kaffir market.

Rand Examined

Let me now examine the situation of the Rand Mines and their shareholders.

It has been officially announced that the July output of gold in the Transvaal reached the new high record of 996,545 fine ounces. As the price of gold for purposes of declaration was fixed at £6.19.6, the value of the output in July was £6,950,902. This is below the record for monthly values of £6,974,358, which was established in March of this year when the valuation price was £7.2s per ounce.

Thus we are brought face to face with the basic fact upon which the present high profits of the Transvaal gold fields undoubtedly depend. I am indebted to the Transvaal Chamber of Mines for its recently published report, which contains (in addition to many valuable statistics in its 190 pages) the president's address on the year 1936 and its results.

Let me quote a few sentences and figures from Mr. Beatty's presidential address:

"Expansion, which has been the feature of the gold mining industry since the Union left the gold standard, continued uninterruptedly during the past year. Again we have to record increases in tonnage crushed and in total working costs and revenue; but the increase in revenue was more than offset by the increasing costs with the result that the working profit was somewhat less. Under the circumstances it is not surprising that South Africa is enjoying a period of unprecedented prosperity, thanks to gold mining expansion and heavy capital expenditure. How much the Union of South Africa owes to the gold mining industry is shown by the fact that in 1936 gold exports totaled over eighty-three millions sterling, equal to over 72 per cent of the total visible exports."

Comparison Interesting

Instead of comparing the results of 1936 with the previous year, Mr. Beatty made the far more interesting comparison of 1936 with 1932, i. e., between the fourth year since the old standard value of gold was shelved and the last year of the gold standard.

In 1932, when the sterling pound was a gold weight instead of being, as it now is, a mere paper unit, the gold won on the Rand amounted to 11,378,064 fine ounces, and the value in sterling gold pounds was £48,985,740. The working profit was £15,306,034; the total working costs were £33,520,059. The salaries and wages of the European and colored employes cost over £16 millions, and the value of stores consumed also over £16 millions. Lastly the tons milled totaled 34,906,450.

Next we take the year 1936. The gold won was rather less than in 1932, namely 11,117,327 fine ounces; but its value had risen by no less than 59 per cent in sterling (the pound being now the paper pound) to £77,970,906. The effect of this was to more than double the working profit which rose to over £32 millions sterling (109 per cent). Meanwhile the working costs arose to over £45 millions, an increase of 35 per cent.

The bill for salaries and wages rose to over £22 millions sterling, an increase of 38 per cent, while the value of stores consumed rose to over £26 millions, an increase of 63 per cent. Finally, since the increase in sterling values made low grade ores profitable, the tons milled rose to 48,221,120 an increase of over 38 per cent. Mr. Beatty's comment deserves the careful study of all investors and would-be investors. He starts with another figure—the costs a ton milled in pennyweights:—

Costs Analyzed

"The reduction in costs a ton in terms of gold from 4.522 to 2.680 dwts. is the most significant comparison, for the good reason that all the other results followed in consequence. The increase in the exchange value of gold has brought within the limits of profitable exploitation many hundreds of millions of tons of ore which previously were not worth a pennyworth of capital expenditure. That is the reason why the crushing rate of the industry increased by 38.1 per cent in the short period of four years.

"To appreciate the full significance, however, of having left the old standard value of gold, it is necessary to look back a little. Suppose gold today had the same exchange value (in sterling) as it had in 1932, what would have been the position of the industry? It is not a pleasant picture and cannot be contemplated with equanimity. I venture the opinion that operations would be approximately 45 per cent of what they are today with very little capital expenditure."

Wages Hold Firm

Such a state of affairs, said Mr. Beatty, would have had such disastrous effects that it would have been necessary to alleviate the position by severe reduction of wages, of taxation and of all other items which make up the working costs.

Mr. Beatty argued that the monetary agreement between Britain, the United States and France, of September 25, 1936, was "of major importance" to the gold industry and might fairly give them confidence for the future. The signs, he thought, "indicate that there is no danger of gold losing its value as a medium of exchange" or of the sterling price of gold diminishing to any serious extent. But since then the French currency has again gone to pieces, and the tripartite agreement is now only bipartite. For the moment the gold scare is supposed to be dead and buried. The United States government is still buying all the gold that is offered at the fixed dollar price and the British government is adding to its superabundant stock of gold.

Nevertheless, there is a background of intelligent opinion both in Washington and London that the taxpayer's money is being wasted. I see that the Republican group of the monetary and banking commission in your House of Representatives has just issued a report on the subject which lays down several indisputable propositions such as that inactive gold reserves are useless and that the price now being paid for this useless gold is artificially high. Whether their recommendation that the surplus gold now buried in Kentucky should be sold and used to pay off the public debt is practicable or not is a problem which I must leave to others; for here I am concerned with the value of the Rand mines.

The present price of the reliable mines which can be trusted to pay a dividend even if the premium on gold disappeared is now midway between the highest and lowest prices of the year. Crown Mines, for example is quoted at about 13¼; their highest price this year was 17 and their lowest 11¼; Brakpan is quoted at 52 which compares with a high price of 67 and a low price of 40.

In the case of the active speculative counters representing recent flotations and developing mines which have hitherto paid no dividends, the fall was naturally greater and the recovery has been less substantial. For example, during the gold scare the ten shilling shares of West Witwatersrand slumped from 397 shillings to 120 shillings; their present price is about 180 shillings.

No doubt the market has been weakened by the ruinous losses suffered by speculators, chiefly in Johannesburg, and this is a reason for expecting further recovery. But for my own part I am inclined to think that present prices are high enough in view of the monetary risks and the precarious foundation upon which half or more of the present profits of the Rand mines depends. In any case a mine is a wasting asset and a 7½ per cent yield such as may now be obtained on some of the best Rand mining shares does not seem to be excessive.

Survivor Describe

leaves and branches lay heaped and tangled over everything. I went over them with the official whose particular care they are. At first sight of the depressing waste he was horrified. But he dug into the ash and found delicate plants still living and blooming. He searched until he found new buds swelling on shrubs and trees, removed tiny patches of bark to find the sap still running, and after an hour was cheerfully convinced that almost all of the very valuable collection of trees and plants could be saved. The curious thing about the Rabaul eruption is that in the town there is no material damage worth mentioning. A few lean-to roofs have collapsed. One or two rough sheds near the water front were smashed by the seismic wave. Telephone and electric power lines were broken by falling branches. The beauty of the town and harbor is spoiled for the time being. But nothing has happened that cannot be remedied at slight cost.

The question of the continuance of Rabaul as the capital of Mandated New Guinea is a vexed one; and Canberra is considering the appointment of a Commission to examine it. To the outside observer it seems madness to maintain a seat of Government and an important commercial center where volcanic tremors are commonplace and four active volcanoes lie within a radius of five miles. For the present it is the seat of Government, and only there can the Administration function. Civil servants were recalled to their duties on June 10. The volcanoes were quieter then; but a few strong tremors since have given unnecessary proof that the subterranean forces are still alive.

Japan-U.S. To Stage Archery Competition

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

CHICAGO, Sept. 10—The first official archery contest between Japan and the United States will take place on October 10 at New York and Tokyo with the scores to be compared by cable, Mr. Paul A. Klopsteg, chairman of the National Archery Association announced at the association's headquarters here today.

Mr. Klopsteg said that arrangements have been completed for the contest with a team of thirty members to represent each side. The American archers, he said, will come exclusively from the Eastern seaboard states, principally New York, while the Japanese belong to the Kyushinkai of Tokyo.

Three hundred archery clubs in other parts of the United States are eager to arrange further contests in which they will have an opportunity to participate, said Mr. Klopsteg.

Next Congress Will Get Diet Of 'Left Overs'

By ALBERT L. WARNER

WASHINGTON, Aug. 21—The work for the next session of Congress is already cut out. The agenda is as clear as if the opening gavels had fallen.

For, as the current session expires, all the "preferred" program which President Roosevelt wanted to see enacted by this time is transferred to the next performance on Capitol Hill. Only the Presidential court bill, which sidetracked the rest of the White House program this year while being shoved to slow death itself, may be among the missing.

And many Congressmen are not sure that even this will fail to be resuscitated in one form or another. The constitutional issue is not forgotten at the White House. One adverse court decision on an important anti-New Deal law or activity may raise again the whole issue of the judiciary and its "vetoes."

Big Decision Due Soon

A number of major cases impend before the high tribunal. The power distribution and sales of the T. V. A., the utility holding company act and the local public power development grants of the P. W. A. will be coming along soon for decision. Then, too, a special Senate committee will be surveying all the problems of the judiciary, with authority to make recommendations capable of embracing both legislative action and Constitutional amendment.

The transfer of the legislative program from the expiring session to the next one means political warfare again. The interim, according to most observers, constitutes a brief resting space but nothing in the nature of a truce. Occasional shot and shell will continue to fly. The White House may even lay down a barrage in the shape of a period of aggressive speechmaking.

Then, when the next session, special or regular, convenes, the old lines will be drawn. The fight will be on once more, its bitterness all the greater because of the Congressional elections to follow.

A Whole New Program

A complete New Deal program, almost all of it already on display, faces the next session. Its proportions, although the President has promised leaders to restrict new proposals in view of campaign exigencies ahead, are formidable, to say the least. Agriculture, industry, labor, income and the forms of government are intimately involved. Here is the program:

A farm production control bill, reviving the principles of the outlawed A. A. A. and expanding the system to embrace the ever normal granary idea of Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture. By resolution of Senate and House this bill will be number one on the agenda next session.

The wage and hour bill, previously passed in the Senate, permitting a Federal board to apply, with variations, minimum standards to industry everywhere, under the broadest concept of the nature of interstate commerce.

Reorganization of the executive branch of government with the creation of at least one new department and a grant of extensive authority to the President to shift or abolish bureaus and agencies. Existing powers of an independent comptroller general over executive expenditures would also be at least curtailed.

The bill creating a series of regional T. V. A.'s covering all parts of the country for Federal planning and development.

The one big proposal for the next session not yet unfurled in anything except vague intimations—a bill overhauling the entire tax structure. The accomplishment of certain national social purposes would be an acknowledged part of the revision.

The crop insurance bill, applicable in the first instance to wheat, but capable of extension. This measure has passed the Senate.

A series of S. E. C. bills relating to corporate reorganizations and otherwise extending powers of the agency.

The anti-lynching bill, not an administration measure, but passed by the House and assured of consideration by the Senate leadership as number two on the calendar of that chamber.

There Are Other Issues

And to this program the possibility of renewal of the constitutional issue, the legislative problems which may rise out of Far East and European wars, the annual appropriation bills, the annual fight over relief, which will be enhanced by an authorized Senate committee investigation into relief, amendments to the social security act and proposed amendments to the national labor relations act.

Also superimposed will be a host of known lesser bills, such as the seventy-car train bill passed by the Senate, a proposed investigation of utilities, authorized by the Senate, and a measure to transfer commercial airplane regulation to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The expiring session was the worst in point of New Deal achievements which the President has yet experienced. His court bill, on which he tested his strength and prestige, was killed. The major bills in the rest of his program were ignored or rejected. More of an internal opposition arose within the Democratic party in Congress than had ever before been demonstrated.

With a New Deal program of the proportions indicated confronting them at the next session, conservative Democrats will have no choice but to keep up the internecine conflict. But the President may be in a better strategic position if he advances his program without the disrupting presence of the court bill, against which the maximum strength of his combined opposition was rallied.

Two other advantages will be allied with the President. In the interim before the next session he will be able to take his case for the New Deal to the people. His opponents, scattered from the capital, will have no sounding board to match the President's. The imminence of the Congressional election will be the other high card in the White House hand. Congressmen running for reelection are naturally cautious. The personal popularity of Mr. Roosevelt has been demonstrated often. There is a suspected danger to Democrats in bucking that popularity. Caution also may come from fear of patronage or pork withheld.

At the moment nothing as dramatic as the court fight is on the horizon. But the capacity for legislative warfare of the first order is unlimited in the New Deal program which now is transferred to the session ahead.

The Living Sphinx

Bernard de Fontenelle (1657-1757), academician, gossip writer, philosopher, critic, playwright and mathematician, wrote his first contribution to literature at the age of 13. He was a man of transcendng intelligence and imperturbable disposition. He never laughed in his life, nor did he ever cry, have a friend or a lover. He lived to the age of 100.

A Best Seller In Spite Of 20 Publishers

"Robinson Crusoe," a best seller for 218 years and probably for all time to come, was written by Daniel Defoe, who founded his tale upon the experiences of Alexander Selkirk, a castaway on the lonely island of Juan Fernandez. The manuscript of "Robinson Crusoe" was rejected by a score of book publishers who failed to foresee the immense popularity of the work. William Taylor, who finally purchased the book, made a considerable fortune by it.

Howe To Go To Nanking

Milland, Barrie

include Kent Taylor, William Gargan, Polly Rowles, Mary Philips, Samuel Hinds, Margaret McWade, Clara Blandick, Joyce Compton and Louise Beavers.

All the male actors except Taylor portray naval officers in the picture. Miss Barrie is seen as the wife of a young lieutenant played by Milland. Miss Rowles is cast as the daughter of an admiral and the sister of Milland's best friend and brother officer, portrayed by William Gargan.

One of the most elaborate Navy pictures ever filmed, "Wings Over Honolulu" was adapted by Isabel Dawn and Boyce DeGaw from a Red Book magazine novel of the same name by Milred Cram, nationally famous fiction writer.

In addition to the Ranger, Navy hangars, planes and the Naval Transport Chaumont were used by the movie crew. Painstaking care was exercised by the studio and the navy to prevent technical errors in the picture. With Lieutenant Commander Schaeffer acting as liaison officer between the navy and the film company, every detail of the production was checked.

Joseph Valentine, one of Hollywood's ace cameramen, handled the photography in "Wings Over Honolulu." Valentine also photographed such notable films as "The Moon's Our Home," "Three Smart Girls" and "Top of the Town," remarkable for their photography.

Palestine Debate Narrowing Down

By CLARENCE K. STREIT

N. Y. Times

ZURICH, Aug. 21—The past week's developments here and at Geneva seem to have left the approaches to the Palestinian puzzle slowly narrowing down to two sets of negotiations starting from opposite philosophies.

On the one side there are negotiations planned for the partition of Palestine into two independent Jewish and Arab States to be divided by a British mandate over Jerusalem and the Jaffa Corridor to the sea. On the other side there are talks aimed at creating a bi-national Jewish-Arab State in Palestine on some federal basis.

The premise behind the first plan is that the Jewish and Arab peoples are too irreconcilable to live together peacefully under a common government. The premise behind the second plan is that the Jews and Arabs can live together peacefully only by reaching a mutual understanding which the formation of a common government presupposes; the conclusion is that peace requires a concentration on this task.

Two Peace Plans

The peace-making method of the first plan is to organize the relations of Jews and Arabs on a State-to-State basis of equality, while the second plan seeks peace by organizing them on a man-to-man kind of equality.

The inspiration, leadership and vital strength of the partition side come from Great Britain, while on the other side they come from the United States. The cleavage is far from perfect—there are British bi-Nationalists, such as Lord Samuel, Neville, Jonas Laski and Norman Bentwich, while the majority of delegates from the United States voted for the Zionist resolution authorizing negotiations for a Jewish State on a partition basis. But the fact remains that the partition proposal originated in a purely British commission and would have got nowhere in the Zionist Congress without the work of Dr. Chaim Weizmann and Lord Melchett. It is equally clear that the main champions here of the federal solution have been American non-Zionists, and the idea would not have made what progress it did in the Jewish Agency meeting without the leadership of Dr Judah L. Magnes and Felix M. Warburg.

British Precedent

The cleavage cited here seems hardly surprising. The British proposal to create two armies, two tariffs, two currencies and two States where one grew before in tiny Palestine only carries to an extreme the principle already applied by developing six armies, six currencies, six tariffs and six States in the British Empire.

America began with thirteen of these things, but as Mr. Warburg reminded the Jewish Agency, Americans sought peace by reducing them to one.

The dominant trends are still toward negotiations on a partition basis, but this school has lost some ground to the bi-Nationalists in the past few days. Its basic theory, namely, that Jewish-Arab relations must be organized on a State-to-State basis, was hardly challenged in the recent Zionist Congress. The bitter debate in that body was not over whether there should be a sovereign Jewish State but whether to try to begin it now with a part of Palestine or wait until the Jews could control all of Palestine.

Most of its minority is as cold as its majority to any bi-national suggestions such as those of the Arab leader, Adil Arslan, which would base the Palestine State Government on the present population ratio, while guaranteeing the Jews religious and language rights and leaving them free to hold the highest offices in the State.

Such a solution requires that the Jews trust in their individual ability to bring and to keep them in a position in a united Palestine to assure Jewish citizens equal rights with Arabs. Zionists as a whole resemble the Arabs in seeking to rule Palestine by a majority determined by birth rather than by brains.

Jewish Agency Debate

With the Jewish Agency session, however, the case for founding Jewish-Arab relations on reason instead of race found strong champions, thanks to the Agency's non-Zionists. They seem not so well organized as the Zionists, but they have behind them a formidable mass of assimilated Jews who have successfully practiced in their own countries the policy they recommend to the Jews of Palestine.

Partition negotiations at the earliest will start only in October after the League Council and Assembly have had their say. No one expects these negotiations to succeed soon, even if the League leaves them still practicable and the Arab opposition to entering any partitionist talks is overcome. The bi-Nationalists have a long way to go to overtake the Partitionists, but they have at least a long time in which to do it.

Britons Planning Sea Dirigible Line

N. Y. Times

LONDON, Aug. 20.—Lord Ventry, wealthy industrialist, confirmed tonight that he is a member of a British syndicate planning a new transatlantic and empire airship service.

"The whole relationship between airplane and airship," he said, "has been altered by a new quantity production of non-inflammable helium gas, of which supplies are obtainable within the British Empire."

A five-year plan, he added, would provide for the importation of two or three airships of American design for experimental purposes, the reopening of the former airship bases at Cardington, Montreal and Karachi, and the sending of airship specialists to Germany to study the latest developments there.

"I can see only a remote possibility of flying boats crossing the Atlantic regularly with passenger loads that would pay, whereas an airship filled with helium can carry forty to fifty passengers with ease, safety and economy," he said.

New Zeppelin Ready in May

N. Y. Times

FRIEDRICHSHAFEN, Germany, Aug. 20.—The Zeppelin Company now expects the new LZ-130 to be ready next March, probably sailing to the United States sometime in May.

All hope of making a commercial success of this ship has been practically abandoned. Planned originally to carry seventy passengers, the ship probably will not be able to carry more than fifty despite radical reconstruction in an effort to keep down the weight.

Dr. Hugo Eckener and his associates hope to be able to eliminate twenty tons in all. Two tons alone will be saved in pins without a sacrifice of strength.

However, the Air Ministry killed the company's last hope of making the LZ-130 a commercial success by insisting that helium be brought to Germany in steel containers to fill the ship for its first flight. The company originally intended to fly the LZ-130, passengerless and observerless, to the United States filled with hydrogen and to fill it with helium there before taking on any passengers. The cost of transporting the helium gas across the ocean will equal the original purchase price, if it does not exceed it. In any case, the helium price is so high as to make profitable operation of the LZ-130 an impossibility.

From a purely technical standpoint the Hindenburg disaster already has borne fruit.

The absolute necessity of reducing weight to make up for the decreased lifting power of helium gas as compared to hydrogen has led to new discoveries both in construction materials and methods.

The LZ-131, for which two rings have been assembled, expectedly will be an entirely different ship than its predecessor.

If it is to be a commercial success with helium, it must probably be much larger, with accommodations for eighty to a hundred passengers. At the same time the structural parts must be much lighter than the same sections in the Hindenburg and the LZ-130.

The LZ-131 probably will not be completed until late 1939. The LZ-131, rather than the LZ-130, will be the real test ship, which perhaps will decide the future of lighter-than-air transportation.

Meantime, the Zeppelin Transportation Company finds itself in possession of an excellent but rather embarrassing source of income. The Graf Zeppelin now is earning more than she ever earned while in actual operation.

London Attitude On Japan's Reply Said Undecided

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

LONDON, Sept. 14—Pessimism is prevailing in political circles here today regarding the prospect of Japan's "final" reply to the British Government's note on the Hugessen incident. The local Havas News Agency bureau learned from well-informed quarters that Tokyo's reply is expected to be similar in tone to the recently-communicated "interim" reply.

It is understood that no decision has yet been taken by the British Cabinet regarding its attitude to be taken in case Japan flatly rejects the British claims advanced in connection with the Hugessen incident.

Informed sources revealed that some ministers of the cabinet had advocated the withdrawal of the British ambassador from Tokyo as a retaliatory measures in the event of Japanese refusal. Such a step, they added, however, is now considered practically out of the question as a result of strong opposition raised by many cabinet ministers, who feared that such a measure would involve serious difficulties.

It is believed in these circles that the British Government plans to fix its definite attitude on the matter only after a "final" reply has been received from Tokyo. It is understood that Premier Neville Chamberlain intends to undertake full exchanges of views with his colleagues on the subject before taking any decision.

US Is Expected

there were any they wouldn't be credible unless they have improved since this correspondent was there fifteen years ago. Anyway the trade, both here and in Europe, apparently is holding off American purchases until Russian grain export possibilities clarify.

A further uncertainty, but of more bullish possibilities, is the crop condition in the southern hemisphere. It appears possible that the Argentine and Australia will harvest 50,000,000 bushels less this year than last, thus diverting more demand to the United States. Australia starts to harvest in November, Argentina in December.

Wheat Futures Active

Wheat futures in Chicago in the past two months have been extremely active, with the near month rising from $1.05 in early June to just under $1.30 and then back last week nearly to $1.10—an unusually wide fluctuation for so short a period. The up-and-down movement has been due to one of the crop scares characteristic of this time of year. Persistent reports of black rust, both in the spring wheat crop and South into the winter wheat, drove prices up in Chicago. However, it began to appear in mid-July that these reports were exaggerated, and the Aug. 7 crop estimate of the U. S. Crop Reporting Board put the crop at 890,000,000 bushels, a shade over the previous month's estimate. Suspicions that the rust damage was not serious had already been aroused by the tremendous movement of wheat to market.

It is plain as a pikestaff that the American farmer will not be able to parley his 1937 winnings on his 1933 crop, barring the most exceptional good fortune. This is our second largest crop since the war. It is also Canada's smallest crop since before the war. And it finds world wheat inventories down to the lowest level since the middle of the war. That triple combination, or something equally favorable, would be necessary for this year's bonanza to repeat itself.

Nevertheless it is quite possible that the American farmer will try to duplicate his success. The favorable price of wheat last fall led to the planting of a record acreage to winter wheat, and the spring wheat planting was near a record, being almost twice that of the previous year. The price this fall appears likely to be just as favorable as last fall.

Lyons Describes

would not furnish the means of preventing Australia from being brought to terms by economic pressure exerted by an aggressor commanding the sea. If the enemy also had powerful land and air forces, these and his free access to the world's resources would present Australia with a formidable task.

It was outstanding in military history that the future of oversea territories was always decided by the outcome of war in the main theater, which for Australia meant a struggle between British and enemy fleets for the control of sea communications. Australians were unlikely to accept a policy of non-cooperation depriving them of Great Britain's powerful aid in these uncertain times.

Australia's defense rested on two pillars her own maximum effort and Empire cooperation, which did not involve any surrender of a vestige of sovereign control of her own policy. The Government's local defense policy was based on priority of expenditure being given to defense against raids, including rearmament of the fixed coast defenses, an increase of the garrisons at the main ports, with air squadrons cooperating.

Mr. Lyons added that the early completion of new munition factories would enable the Commonwealth to share in orders for peace-time supplies required by the United Kingdom and possibly by other Dominions.

The Commonwealth's defense vote in 1936-37 was £8,809,000—the highest peacetime expenditure in the history of the Dominion. The vote for 1937-38, during which a new three-year program will be begun, is expected to exceed this total.

Farley Pictures Next President

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 21.—The Roosevelt program and Roosevelt policies assuredly will be carried out by the next Democratic candidate for the Presidency, "whoever he may be," in the opinion of Postmaster General James A. Farley, expressed in an exclusive interview.

Discussing the present political strength of the party, the national chairman declared that it would "gain Governorships in New Jersey, Maryland and California and would certainly lose none in other States."

"If Mr. Roosevelt were to be up for re-election tomorrow, he would be swept in by forty-eight States," he added. "I have been all over the country very recently and the sentiment of the people is as strongly Roosevelt as ever."

New Era of Liberalism

Mr. Farley expressed the belief that the nation could never return to the conditions that prevailed when Mr. Roosevelt first took over the Presidency. While he would not comment upon the possibility of Mr. Roosevelt's succeeding himself in 1940, he declared that nothing but advances would be made in the liberal program of the President.

"While the Democratic party has always been liberal, Mr. Roosevelt ushered in an era of liberalism that sets him as far ahead of his times as Jefferson was ahead of his," he said.

"And the next candidate will adhere to a program of liberalism that will carry out the Roosevelt principles, whoever that candidate may be."

"Never Any Split" in Party

Asked if he believed the dissension over the Supreme Court question indicated a permanent split in the Democratic ranks, Mr. Farley replied:

"There has never been a split over that or any other question. Let the Senators who dissented on the court question and, naming them, consider if they represent the political opinion of their States.

"If you boil the dissension down, I think you will find it has been a matter of personal opinion. Individual decisions have not been representative of the politics of the States themselves.

"There have been straws in the wind to indicate clearly where the people stand. From one end of the country to the other, I have found their sentiment to be with the President."

Home Buying as Labor Factor

He was asked if he attached any "political significance" to the present labor troubles.

"What do you mean by political significance?" he responded. "There have always been labor troubles, more or less, particularly on the tide of prosperity, and I daresay they have always been more or less exaggerated.

"Nearly everything we fear or make an undue fuss over in this life doesn't happen. And I think that is true of these present disturbances. These things straighten themselves out, given a little time. This is especially true in this country.

"While I haven't the statistics at hand, I believe we own more homes, as a nation, than any other country on the face of the earth. That means that there are payments to be met regularly and the ordinary daily obligations of living to be kept up.

"Such obligations will not permit us to indulge in lengthy labor rows or to engage in long-drawn-out labor controversies. There are too many homeowners in this country for us to stand in fear of permanent unrest."

For Crop Law and End of Idleness

In the opinion of the Postmaster General, it is "essential" for Congress to pass crop legislation.

"This should be done immediately to insure our continuing prosperity," he explained.

The second important question before the nation, in his opinion, is unemployment.

"While there has been definite improvement in conditions of unemployment, there is great need for reducing unemployment still more," he said.

"In my opinion, it is of vital importance to cooperate with industrialists to the end that unemployment may be wiped out. This cooperation with industry I see as one of the most important steps to a permanent prosperity and national readjustment to the employment situation."

"Tough" to Be Roosevelt Successor

Mr. Farley believes the country is definitely "on its feet again."

"But no matter how outstanding the man may be who is destined to follow after Mr. Roosevelt, it is going to be a tough assignment," he went on.

"I doubt if we have ever had a more unusual public figure in this country, or a man capable of such prodigious accomplishment as the President.

"In addition to this, his personal appeal is very strong. The people of this country trust him; and they like him. He is so unique historically, that the next President is bound to suffer by comparison, no matter how good a President he may be."

Skirting that "third term" question several times, Mr. Farley permitted quotation of one observation. With a twinkle in his eye, he remarked:

"Who'd want that job for twelve years?"

Then his interviewer was reminded that it was Mr. Farley, and not Mr. Roosevelt, speaking.

Sanctions Distort Italy's Adverse Trade Figures

Christian Science Monitor

ROME—The adverse trade balance of Italy for the first six months of 1937 totaled 3,169 million lire (about £33,000,000) against 1,532 million lire in the corresponding period of the preceding year. The comparison between these two figures, however, is somewhat misleading, since in 1936 there were many restrictions in force which do not exist today and moreover, that was a period when Italy was economically besieged by League of Nations sanctions.

Total Italian imports in the period January-June, 1937, were valued 6935 million lire, while exports were valued 3,776 million lire. In the same period of 1936 imports were valued 2786 million lire while exports were only 1254 million lire. The volume of Italy's imports and exports is increasing each month, but the rise in imports is greater than that of exports. The trade returns for June, for instance, showed imports valued 1530 million lire against 1327 millions in May, while exports totaled 787 million lire against 618 millions in May. If the present monthly rate of the excess of imports over exports is maintained for the remaining half of 1937, Italy will be faced at the end of the year with a commercial deficit exceeding 1000 million lire, which will be offset only in small part by invisible exports.

Trade figures with Italy's African colonies are not included in the totals given. Trade with colonies in the first six months of 1937 showed imports of 135,000,000 lire against 72,000,000 lire in the corresponding period of 1936. Exports came to 1,-47,000,000 lire against 868,000,000 lire.

Imports of wheat in the first half of 1937 amounted to 1,455,000 tons of a value of 1,203,000,000 lire. Coal imported during this period totaled 5,-946,000 tons, against 4,902,000 in 1936. The value was 726,500,000 lire, against 366,900,000 lire, last year. The figures for 1934, which may be considered as the last standard year because it was exempt from exchange restrictions and sanctions, were: Quantity, 5,571,000 tons and valued 364 million lire. The chief suppliers of coal to Italy during the first six months of 1937 were Germany with 3,541,000 tons against 1,959,000 tons in the corresponding period of 1936; Poland, 873,000 tons against 508,000; Great Britain with 657,000 tons against 2,263,000 tons; Czechoslovakia with 303,000 tons against 109 tons; Belgium 134,000 tons against 21,000 tons; France 2000 tons against 24,000; other countries 136,- tons against 600 tons.

The Killer of John Wesley Hardin

John Wesley Hardin, who served time for the killing of 44 men, was pardoned by Governor Hogg of Texas on March 16, 1894. He was killed by John Selman, deputy constable, who shot him in an El Paso saloon on August 19, 1895. Selman was arrested by his own son who was a constable. He was acquitted after he swore that he had fired in self-defense. John Selman, Sr. was in turn shot to death by U.S. Deputy Marshal George Scarborough in an alleyway outside a saloon on April 5, 1896. Scarborough too, was acquitted after he pleaded self-defense.

The Mysterious Strong Stream

The Euripus River is a natural phenomenon of a body of water, flowing in two different directions. The stream suddenly reverses itself every 6 hours, and flows in the opposite direction. The ships stand by under the protection of a drawbridge, waiting for the reversion of the river's flow. This phenomenon puzzled the ancient Greeks as far back as the time of Aristotle. They still believe that the phenomenon is due to the action of demons of the deep.

To Broadcast More News In English Over JOAK

Broadcasting of news in English from station JOAK of the Broadcasting Corporation of Japan has been extended in scope, the first of the new English news programs having gone on the air Monday night beginning at 10:35 p.m. This 10 minute news broadcast will go on the air daily at the same time and may be heard over the secondary transmission system of JOAK on a frequency of 870 kilocycles, which corresponds to a wavelength of 344 meters, the same frequency as that used for all secondary program transmissions of the Broadcasting Corporation of Japan on its Empire network. As the power of the transmission is 150 kilowatts it is expected that it will be heard throughout the Far East as well as in Japan.

In addition to the new English news program, JOAK will also broadcast news in Chinese over the same system beginning at 10:45 p.m. every day.

Chinese Planes Bombard Japanese Hospital Ship

According to a communique issued by the press section of the Japanese fleet at 11:00 a.m. today, Chinese warplanes bombed the Japanese hospital ship Asahi Maru flying a Red Cross ensign at 8:30 o'clock last night off Woosung. Although no damage was done to the human elements, the hull of the ship was stated to have been considerably damaged in the bombardment.

MARITZA, MIYAGI TO GIVE JOINT RECITAL

On account of the unusual advance interest in Maritza's first harp concert at the Meiji Seimei Auditorium Tuesday, September 21, she will follow this by giving a joint recital with Michio Miyagi, Japan's foremost koto soloist, also at the Meiji Seimei, on Sunday, September 26, at 7:30. This will be her final appearance in Tokyo, as she sails immediately afterwards on the "Hakozaki Maru" for Singapore.

For the koto group on the September 26 program, Miyagi will play "Water Wheel in the Canyon" ("Tanima no Mizuguruma."), "Sea in Spring" ("Haru no Umi"), "River Rapids" ("Seoto") and "Cherry Blossoms" ("Sakura").

New numbers on the French harp in Maritza's groups will be "Legende", by Henriette Renie, "Waltz", by Brahms, "French Folk Song", by Grandjany, "Marche Militaire", by Hasselmans, "Vers la Source dans le Bois", by Tournier, and "Fraicheur", by Salzedo.

Maritza and Michio Miyagi were guests of honor at a tea and reception Thursday at the Sanno Hotel, attended by Sonoko Inouye, Tamaki Miura, members of the Societe de la Harpe au Nippon and other prominent artists of the concert world.

Tickets for the Maritza-Miyagi joint recital are now on sale at the Playguide.

'Fake Eye Doctors'

one of their agents; that the glasses were guaranteed, and that he had come to check on them free of charge.

Brings In a "Great Doctor"

"This man pretends to examine the victim's eyes and glasses, and falsely claims that there is a condition of the victim's eyes which he does not understand. He tells the victim that he has with him in his car on the outside a doctor from some renowned institution who is one of the greatest experts on the eye, who he is sure would make an examination free of charge.

"The man is called in from the car, and he too pretends to examine the eyes of the victim and falsely represents that he finds a cataract or a cancerous growth on one of the eyes. Finally the victim is led to believe that this man is a great doctor and expert in the examination and treatment of the eye, and he submits to the pretended operation, which it is alleged can be done painlessly with radium, and that the only expense will be the cost of the radium used.

"The alleged expert produces a small vial containing an ordinary eye wash, but alleged to be radium water, and this liquid is placed in the victim's eye, a few drops at a time, the alleged expert examining the vial after each application and announcing the value of the radium used. One of these alleged experts gave as the reason for announcing the value of the radium used after each application of the eye wash was to ascertain what the victim could pay.

"In cases where the swindlers believe additional funds can be obtained two additional members of the racket are sent to call on the victim, and these in turn pay those who precede them 25 per cent of what they get. These make the victim believe that the great doctor who performed the operation had been killed and before his death asked that they call and find out if the operation was a success, and if not to refund the money which had been paid.

Forty Arrests Made in Inquiry

"Since the inspectors started the investigation of the 'fake eye specialist racket' there have been forty arrests and thirty-five convictions. Sentences imposed total 177 years and 9 months, and fines $9,975.

"One of the most inhuman cases brought to attention was perpetrated in the State of Massachusetts on an invalid girl, a living skeleton, who was born blind. Two of the racketeers made her father believe her vision was obstructed with malignant growths over the iris, and that by removing the growths, which they claimed to be able to do with liquid radium, she would be able to see within several days.

"They pretended to perform the operation and demanded $2,500 of the father, but he had only $500 and they took that.

"The two swindlers who victimized the aged father of the girl are in custody. One of them was loaned by the Government to a State, where he received a sentence of five years. He is yet to be tried on a Federal charge of using the mails to defraud in connection with a fake eye specialist swindle. The other swindler was he who attempted suicide shortly after his arrest, and he is now a miserable invalid, biding his time in jail awaiting trial.

"Five people were involved in the first case which came to the attention of the inspectors, four fake eye specialists and a fence who collected for them through the mails a $2,500 check which was obtained from the victim. All of these have been arrested. Four have received substantial sentences and one is in jail awaiting trial."

British Charge D'Affaires Sees Dr. Wang Chung Hui

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SHANGHAI, Sept. 15—Mr. R. G. Howe, British Charge d'Affaires, who arrive in Nanking yesterday, this morning called on Dr. Wang Chung-hui, Chinese Foreign Minister, at the Waichiaopu, when he reportedly notified the latter than the British envoy would assume duties as Charge d'Affaires while Sir Hughe M. now are nearly at record high levels.

Throughout the Texas ranching country it is admitted that sheep and goat raisers own more high-price automobiles than most other class of citizens. They live in well-built stone houses, equipped with every comfort. They send their sons and daughters to college and the young men and women come back to the range country to aid their parents in carrying on a business which dates back to the 80's. It was then that the first sheepmen made their appearance around the headwaters of the Devil's River and eventually drove out the cattlemen who moved into the Gulf Coast country or into the Trans-Pecos mountains.

The comparatively large size of Texas sheep and goat ranches is for the purpose of providing adequate range for the animals. Thus they may be moved from a dry part of the range to one freshened by rains. The rains of summer over the Edwards Plateau are likely to be erratic and far apart. A ranch of 5000 acres has a better opportunity to have good range during the entire year than one of 1000 acres.

Windmills Great Aid

Sheep raisers give much credit to the windmill for the conquest of the range. The Edwards Plateau drains to the southeast and the run-off of rainfall is rapid. There are no lakes. The deep canyons are witnesses of the power of the water that runs off the range. But deep down in limestone, which, incidentally, bears the same name as the Plateau, there is abundant water. Windmills lift the precious water from 250 to 350 feet and fill tanks on the ranches. The herds of sheep, goats and cattle do not have to search for water; they are generally near by to a concrete reservoir.

On the newer ranches gasoline motors lift the water. Electricity is used to shear the flocks, giving employment to wandering Mexican expert shearers who follow the herds with clock-like regularity. The spring wool and mohair clip is the more important, although in some seasons, when demand is acute for these fleeces, ranchmen may decide to shear in the autumn. Occasionally, when prices are not attractive, the ranchmen may postpone shearing their Angoras in order to obtain 12 or 15 months' fleece, commanding substantially higher prices. At other times the mills do not want extraordinarily long fleece, and two clips a year are sent to market.

La Meri Opens Fall Season Of Visiting Artists

Dancer's Versatility Convincing In Program Given At Hibiya Hall

By VINCENT CANZONERI

The fall season of visiting artists to Tokyo was opened Thursday evening at the Hibiya Hall with the first of three recitals given by the dancer La Meri assisted by Ramgopal.

More correctly speaking, this was the second appearance of La Meri as she recently presented an illustrated lecture on the influences of Indian dances on the dances of Japan which was under the sponsorship of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai. La Meri is of American-Spanish stock and has devoted her attention to the dances of the many countries she has visited. She has recently been studying in India where she discovered the young, but very promising Ramgopal.

Program In 3 Parts

La Meri's program was divided into three parts; a group each of Spanish dances, interpretative dances and racial dances. Her in-born Spanish temperament found her well at home with the first group. A creative ability brought out some interesting ideas, some quite effective, in the second group. The last group had an educational value that could be put to a noble use in bringing the dances of scattered countries about the globe to those not endowed with the means of travel.

The program was opened by a conventional Spanish dance to the music of "Goyescas" by Granados that made use of those well known "come hither" expressions of the Spanish dancer besides the use of the castanets. This was followed by what the program gave as "Alegrias," a Spanish dance of very decided Central Asian influence.

La Meri's "Gitanerias" was danced to music sounding suspiciously like that M. Ravel wrote for his "Bolero". Here the dancer wore a wine-red velvet rumba costume with a green shawl and the rise of the curtain discovered her prostrate in the rear center of the stage. The opening drum passage of the composition slowly induced the right arm of the red figure to languid wavy motions and soon the diabolic music awakened vivid passions that became more colorful as the music rose to a climax. As the program unfolded, this dance stood out as the most effective and successful dance given by La Meri during the course of the evening. This Spanish group was closed by "Asturiana" in which the dancer appeared in the costume of a young bubbling peasant maid naively awkward in exposing her ample under garment. A touch of whimsey overflowed, unfortunately beyond the point of saturation, but nevertheless it appealed to her enthusiatic audience.

Highly Impressionistic

This same mood was carried over into the first number of the second group which was danced to Kreisler's "Caprice Viennoise." Here light and airy movements were effected by a coy creature in a pale-green powder-puff-like costume in a toe-dance. This was followed by a Peacock dance. The dancer was costumed in a white tight fitting head-gear which connected with her close-fitting bodice and ended in a white train effecting the lines of a white peacock. The music and the dance were both highly impressionistic. This group was concluded with a rather effective interpretation of Dvorak's "Humoresque" with the use of masks to outline the changing moods of the composition. Her momentary retirements from the stage to quickly change her masks were well timed and the contrasts she produced were very interesting.

The closing group was opened with the dance of "Tillana" in which La Meri's versatility was indeed convincing. Her study in India must have been intense. The following dance of "Krishna and Radha" was the highlight of the evening. The dance depicts the god of love who comes upon his beloved who is at her morning toilet; he plays on his flute and then weaves a garland which he places around her neck and then the two fall into a blissful dance together. In this dance and the dance of Shiva that followed, Ramgopal's splendid dancing left a desire for more of this very promising exponent of Indian dancing.

The "Hoop Dance" that followed these Indian dances shifted the compass to America and her early so-called Indians. The next dance, a rumba, then transported her audience to the atmosphere of Latin-America and the evening was concluded by a "Hula" danced to the well-known Hilo March showing great originality in La Meri's conception of this Hawaiian dance.

France Endeavors

final crash will be the more severe.

Yes, but the purpose, as now explained, is not to resist foolishly a definite movement either up or down, but merely to regularize it, and to let it run its course in easy stages, without violent perturbations. This modest object is more important than would appear at first sight. For timely intervention may stop an incipient panic, and so actually prevent a drop that has no proper causes.

It is necessary, therefore, to distinguish between two different things—the fluctuations provoked by passing events or rumors in an ultra-sensitive market, and the real tendency of the Rentes. It is to the former that the Fund directs its attention, and does not propose to interfere with the latter.

Seriousness of Fall

How serious was the fall may be gauged by the fact that the old three per cents, under the first Front Populaire Government, fell below 60 per cent of their par value. And it should be remembered that this 60 per cent was in depreciated Auriol francs, not in Poincare francs. By the end of July, with Georges Bonnet at the Finance Ministry, they came back to 73.

That is excellent, but it is not enough, especially in view of the further depreciation of the franc. In Switzerland, for instance, the three per cents, after the devaluation of last year, immediately went to par. So it has been in all countries after devaluation. The credit of France is still extremely low.

An example of the surprising oscillations of Rentes may be shown in a few figures. The 4½ per cent of 1932, of which 80,000,000 francs are held by the thrifty Frenchman, were sold at 89 per cent at the end of 1935. They fell to 76 in the first quarter of 1936, to 68 in July, 1936, and then leapt up to 82 in October. By May of this year they were down to 69, and in June to 65. They are once more around 74.

Are these variations fully justified by the currents of public opinion? The volume of transactions on the Bourse is limited. There has been virtual stagnation for a long time. Therefore there may easily be exaggerations in one sense or another.

Confidence Expected

It is believed by the experts that the public will have confidence again in the Rentes if it knows that a special fund is ready to support the bonds against any monetary fears or against deliberate speculations. If the Government succeeds in restoring French finances, then the Rentes may be expected to rise progressively, and it is the business of the fund to see that the public is not discouraged by a series of inexplicable setbacks.

The Frenchman has always supposed that he could not lose his capital if he invested it in State bonds. He has been taught that his losses may be extremely heavy. He has accordingly hidden his money. But if he now has the assurance of a real stability, he will doubtless bring out his hidden money, and by buying French Rentes second the action of the fund.

The fund is well supplied with cash. It has 6,000,000,000 francs with which to maneuver—i.e. roughly $240,000,000. That is more than enough to offset any attack on the Rentes, provided the political situation, so greatly troubled since the elections of 1936 is now improved, and the fear of bankruptcy and revolution, which rightly or wrongly was entertained by many Frenchmen, is dissipated.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Simplon Tunnel

The work on this tunnel, considered one of the greatest achievements of human ingenuity, was started on November 21, 1898. The junction of the two opposite headings was effected on February 24, 1905 when the thin diaphragm of rock separating the two bores was burst through. It was then discovered that the openings coincided within 11 inches of one another.

Baled In Hay For 3 Weeks

Several years ago Stable Foreman D. W. Durham, of the Elliott Ice Co., Charlottesville, Virginia, pulled a bale of hay from the loft and upon breaking the bale, out rolled a live cat, leaving the perfect imprint of its body in the tightly packed hay. The astounded Mr. Durham immediately took the thin, weak animal under his care, and within a few days it was fully recovered. Figuring the time the bale had been in the plant, plus the time in transit, the cat had been in its tomb for at least three weeks and possibly longer.

HIKONE CASTLE PARTIALLY COLLAPSES

Partial collapse of Hikone Castle, Shiga Prefecture, was reported a few days ago, and is much regretted by by citizens of Hikone, as the castle is soon to be designated a national treasure by the Education Ministry. The castle was built about 850 years ago and is one of the famous castles in Japan.

New Books Offer 'Higher Morality'

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Aug. 22.—A set of ten books which frankly challenges the validity of contemporary views on sex, marriage, the family and ethical standards generally will be put to experimental use this Fall in twenty-six public and private schools and teachers' colleges throughout the country. Instead, the books offer "a higher morality" divested of "superstitions, habits and customs, racial superiorities and economic frustrations."

Seven schools in the metropolitan area are included in the group scheduled to introduce the books issued by the Progressive Education Association to bridge "a serious gap" between present school curricula and everyday problems of living. They are the Bronxville Public High School, Freehold (N. J.) public schools, Fieldston, Dalton and Lincoln schools in the city: Scarborough School and home economics classes at Teachers College, Columbia University.

Teachers from Washington Irving and Benjamin Franklin high schools in New York are aiding in re-editing the books, which the association hopes will be used in several city schools this Fall.

Three of the works are intended primarily for students, one for fathers and mothers, entitled "Do Adolescents Need Parents," (the answer being a reassuring yes,) and the remaining six, compendia of source materials for teachers. They have been written by the association's Commission on Human Relations on funds granted by the General Education Board.

Publication Awaits Study

Final publication of the texts, which at present are in multigraphed form, is expected early next year after criticism and suggestions from thousands of teachers, parents, doctors and students have been studied for possible incorporation into their pages.

Written in a sprightly, colloquial, almost matter-of-fact style, the three student texts are titled "Society and Family Life," "Psychology and Human Living," and "Life and Growth."

The last named work, regarded as basic to the set, has been written, according to Dr. Alice V. Keliher, chairman of the commission, with studied simplicity so that its final chapters comprising straightforward answers to sex queries, both physical and moral, will be accepted without any feeling of self-consciousness by the adolescent readers.

In the main, "Life and Growth," as are the other texts, is based on thousands of conferences held over a period of two years with secondary school students and on their replies to questionnaires concerning intimate problems for which they have found no acceptable or understandable solution.

"Petting," inquiries as to the origin of life and many others were the questions which on the basis of its study the commission felt were disturbing American young people who typically are earnestly trying to be realistic about the things they believe in.

"And we of the older generation," added Dr. Keliher in an interview, "must be as realistic as they."

Regarded as the underlying theme of "Life and Growth," one passage declares:

"The problems with which our culture surrounds the processes of reproducing our kind are ofttimes most perplexing ones. It is easy to see that the coming together of two of these complex beings, man and woman, with the purpose of merging their lives in marriage, family life and the raising of children, may present some problems.

"One of the most serious of these problems is their lack of information about themselves, their own growth, their own needs, the processes of reproduction and the responsibilities to be shared in marriage.

"The taboos of our culture are almost entirely responsible for this lack. And it is, indeed, difficult for sensible people to understand. The only way for humankind to continue is through reproduction. One of the few experiences all humans have in common is the way they came into being."

Farther on, parents who lie to their children about the origin of the new brother or sister are criticized with the explanation that "the trouble is that parents themselves have been brought up with so many taboos and blockings that they find it hard and sometimes impossible to break through them to be honest with their children."

Frankness on Sex Expression

In a paragraph on pre-marital sexual experience it declares that "complete sex expression is denied by our culture before marriage and for the unmarried. Some people accept this demand, use their energies constructively and live happily with this solution. Others refuse to accept the dictates of the culture and make sex expression a part of their lives without the sanction of marriage.

"To be happy with this solution people must be tough in their feelings about what others think. A culture as hard on those who differ in superficial ways is especially intolerant of those who go against its strongest taboo."

Later on the book continues:

"Physical and emotional reactions should be understood when young people are making their design. And they probably would be wise to look realistically at present and future in making these decisions.

"Sometimes girls fear being thought prudes and poor sports if they refuse to indulge in heavy petting. Sometimes boys think girls expect them to be amorous. This is a poor basis for such important choices.

"The better basis is the choice of values for what you want to believe in, what memories and what expectations you want to carry into marriage and what creative uses you might be making of the same energy by restraining intimate, intense and sexually exciting petting."

Basis of the Program

The commission started its work with the theory that "some vital spark has been missing in our great educational machine. The evidence lies in a restless and turbulent younger generation that is mostly either surprisingly ignorant or surprisingly well versed in things that aren't so.

"The ugly proof of this ignorance and misinformation is sprawled boldly across the records of our courts, our social welfare agencies and our schools. It is not by chance that crime is most prevalent in the age group just above that of high school. That is the age when most youngsters first meet life—and the shock is too much for them."

The thousands of questions asked by American youth, the commission found, fell naturally into three general groups: Family affairs, life and growth and the general paradoxes of human behavior. The books follow these topical divisions.

"Society and Family Life," written by Leo Huberman and Lorine Pruette, represents an attempt to clarify problems of family relationships as they arise "in our changing culture."

The work stresses the importance of the family as a social institution, since "it has the first contact with the growing child." It cites the status of the family among aboriginal tribes, in such countries as Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany and historically traces the development of the family in America.

"Ox-Cart Images" Scored

"The majority of opinions and attitudes which prevail today," the authors assert, "are traditional ones which no longer fit the present situation. The trouble is that changes do not come at the same rate. We live in an airplane age and retain our ox-cart images. We have a cultural hangover which is giving our society a terrible headache."

Newspaper stories are quoted to show the "contradictions within society." An 18-year-old girl sues her parents for the right to use cosmetics and make dates. A university student is sentenced by a judge because she prefers to live away from home "with her radical friends."

"Such conflicts will continue to arise until we learn to dump overboard those traditional notions that are out of joint with our own times," the authors assert.

A later chapter which presents a cross-section on American family levels, adopts as its slogan "what a whale of a difference a few cents make." With a profusion of pictorial statistics and quotations from the Brookings Institution, Secretary Wallace, The New York Times and other sources, it records the impact of economic forces on the American family unit.

In the text, "Psychology and Human Living," addressed primarily by its author, Walter C. Langer, to upper high school and college students, the conclusions drawn are that early environment plays a major role in determining later attitudes in life; that "we all have our pet unconscious fears and hopes which we are continually projecting upon our physical and social environments"; that "frustration is truly the mother of invention" and the propelling force behind our art, inventions, legal order, living standards.

Power of Literary Experience

"Literature and Human Living," written by Dr. Louise Rosenblatt, instructor in English at Barnard College, calls upon literature teachers to become "more keenly aware that 'literary experience' may contribute powerfully to the creation of the understanding and insight necessary for active participation in a democracy."

Other members of the commission are Edna Albers, Willard W. Beatty, Earl S. Goudey, Mark A. May and Robert Wunsch.

Schools outside the suburban area which will use the books include the State Teachers College, Fredonia, N. Y.; classes at the State Teachers College, Greeley, Col.; New Haven Teachers College; education class at Ohio State University; Junior High Training School, Western Washington, College of Education, Bellingham, Wash.

Also Tower Hill School, Wilmington, Del.; North Shore Country Day School, Winnetka, Ill.; Radnor High School, Wayne, Pa.; Winsor School, Boston; Cambridge School, Kendal Green, Mass.; Francis Parker School, Chicago. Hammond (Ind.) Public School; Metairie Park Country Day School, New Orleans; North Denver High School, Denver; University High School, Oakland, Calif.; Beaver Country Day School, Chestnut Hill, Mass.; South Philadelphia High School for Girls, Philadelphia; George School and Friends Central School in Pennsylvania.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

An Empire Sacrificed For Love

After the death of Emperor Alexander I of Russia on December 9, 1825, the succession to the Russian throne devolved upon his younger brother Constantine. He was acclaimed as Emperor of all the Russias, covering 1/6 of the earth's surface. But Constantine replied that he had a few years previously renounced his right to the throne for the sake of the 20-year old Janina Grudzinska, a commoner of Polish nationality, whom he married. Although Nicholas, his brother, who was next in line, refused to acknowledge this abdication and urged his brother to assume the crown, Constantine insisted that he preferred his happiness to a throne, for which he would have to renounce "the woman he loved."

As a result, after 16 days of interregum, Nicholas became Emperor of Russia and ruled 30 years. Constantine died of the cholera in 1831 and was followed in death by his wife within a few months.

Neutrality Status

chief and impelling duty at the present time is to remove our citizens from the war zone as rapidly as possible and to protect their lives to such extent as he may during such period of evacuation.

It is necessary that during this period he maintain the friendship of the people of both Japan and China as the strongest aid to the protection of the lives of our citizens and their safe and expeditious evacuation. It is true that more than friendship of peoples is necessary.

Every country in times of war has its guerrillas, bandits and pirates actively and lawlessly engaged in murder and loot. Both China and Japan expect our Government to furnish its own police force for the purpose of protecting our citizens against such lawless forces until they can be safely removed from danger zones.

China is an enormous country. It is larger than the United States. We have missionaries and teachers, explorers and business men, in the most remote territory. Transportation is difficult and slow. In many places they have no protection through the military or police forces of either China or Japan.

The outcry coming even as it does from some intelligent sources that we should immediately withdraw our army and navy and leave our citizens in China without protection is cowardly and unpatriotic and reflects upon the dignity and glory of our country. No such request comes either from China or Japan.

The Augusta Incident

Recently an unfortunate accident has happened to one of our naval vessels in front of Shanghai. A small anti-aircraft shell fell upon the ship, resulting in the unfortunate and unhappy death of one of our sailors and injury to a number of others.

When the news first reached the United States, there was great excitement. There was fear that one of our war vessels had been attacked by the forces of either China or Japan, which might mean war.

It was hardly possible to deter-evident, however, that it was not mine who had fired the shot. It was fired directly at the vessel, but had fallen from the air; that having missed its objective, it fell again toward the earth.

Both the Chinese and Japanese Governments denied responsibility for the accident and gave every assurance of regret and an intention to use every precaution that it might not again happen.

In fact, both of the warring forces have treated our naval and military forces in China with the greatest courtesy and respect and have done what they could in such an intense emergency to grant every possible protection.

While the loss of the lives of our sailors and marines causes us the deepest sadness, yet we realize that such is their life and that they must risk their lives for the protection of our citizens. They glory in the service that they perform.

The President is performing a most difficult duty in an able and patriotic manner. We have a right to be proud that we are American citizens.

British Soldiers

its camps the brigade was assembled at Downham Market early this evening, ready to move south on its raid into enemy territory.

Warning of the incursion was obtained from an imaginary spy who had overheard Lancastrian staff officer talking at an inn. And at 6 p.m. the commander of the Anglian second division came to the headquarters of the 5th Infantry Brigade at Elder Street, south of Saffron Walden. He told the acting commander, Lieutenant-Colonel M. K. Wardle, that the raiding force was expected to leave the vicinity of Wisbech after dusk and that the spy had heard the word "Thetford" mentioned—which seemed to give a hint of its not merely to move up and protect the factories passively, but to ensure that the raiders pay heavily for their audacity—as a deterrent to further attempts.

Motorized "Marches"

The 5th Brigade arrived in three bivouac areas near Saffron Walden this afternoon, having brought thither in its own infantry transport trucks, which sufficed to carry it in a couple of trips. It was an interesting example of the new mobility which the infantry has acquired, even without special omnibus companies, through the use of its own handy yet capacious little vehicles. The night move of the 6th Brigade promises to provide a still more interesting and useful test of motorized marches made under war conditions. The choice of directions of approach open to the raiding force in this exercise is narrowed by the scheme "fact" that the River Stour has been flooded as far up as Long Melford, while to the west Newmarket is supposed to be strongly held by Territorial troops. Even if the raiders succeed in passing through this 12-mile gap the advantage they have in alternative objectives being offered is diminished by the closeness of these—for the two gas factories are barely four miles apart. The prospects of deceiving the defending force as to their actual target would thus seem to be proportionately small.

Nanking Will Open New Line To Connect Shanghai And Canton

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SHANGHAI, Sept. 19—In an urgent move to secure an overland line of transportation for the movement of troops and war materials in the face of the interception of Chinese shipping on the China coast, the National Government today has announced the inauguration of a new line of communication to link Shanghai with Canton.

According to the announcement, the new line will connect the Shanghai - Hangchow - Ningpow Railway with the Yushan-Pingsiang Railway, which latter will be linked at Chuchow in Hunan Province with the Hankow-Canton Railway. The new line will be opened to traffic on September 20.

La Meri Pleases Tokyo Enthusiasts In Second Recital

La Meri, the visiting dancer, gave the second of her three recitals at the Hibiya Public Hall assisted by Ramgopal, her Hindu protege, at 7:30 p.m. Monday. The recital was attended by a fairly large and extremely appreciative audience.

The program was entirely different from the one given at the first recital Thursday, but, as the first, was divided into three parts. The first part of the program consisted of four Spanish dances, including the Bolero 1830, the Vida Breve, a dance taken from de Falla's opera, La Vida Breve, the Dance of Terror, also by de Falla and the Shawl Dance. In the Shawl Dance Meri used five beautiful Spanish shawls of different colors and designs.

Interpretive Dances

The second part of the program was comprised of four interpretative dances, the first being Chopin's Nocturne, followed by Faunesque, The Adoration of the Virgin and the Russian Doll. The Adoration of the virgin was danced to the Addagio movement of Vivaldi's Orgel Concerto and consisted of a series of poses depicting the religious paintings of Lippi the Italian painter.

The most popular number was undoubtedly the Russian Doll in which La Meri was dressed in a beautiful colorful costume and interpreted the stiff movements of a doll with great skill. This last dance was received with great applause.

The third part of the program consisting of six racial dances. In this group La Meri gave three solo dances, a Javanese dance, a Hindu dance and an Argentine dance. She and Ramgopal gave a Hindu dance and a Mexican dance and Ramgopal gave one solo dance Mayura Nrittya. Mayura Nrittya is the dance of a peacock in the garden and the interpretation which the skilful young Hindu dancer gave was received with such great applause by the audience that he was compelled to give an encore.

Costumes Authentic

Each dance in the program needed a complete change of costume and each costume was authentic. La Meri's versatility seems unlimited. In each dance her whole appearance changes so that it hardly seems possible that one person can portray so many different types.

The dance enthusiasts of Tokyo and Yokohama look forward with anticipation to the final recital to be given by La Meri at the same hall at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday. Again her program will consist of fourteen dances and will be entirely different from the first two recitals.

Railway Reform In France Planned

Times, London

PARIS, Aug. 30.—M. Chautemps, the Prime Minister, M. Bonnet, Minister of Finance, and a number of Treasury officials, and M. Queuille, Minister for Public Works, continued today their discussions on the question of railway reform. The principle of the National Railway Company, in which the State is to play an active part, has been accepted both by the Cabinet and the railway companies, and today's discussions, it is believed, were concerned chiefly with the manner of the Government's representation on the board of directors of the new company.

Later in the day M. Fournier, Governor of the Bank of France, and M. Deroy, Director of the Caisse des Depots et Consignations (a financial institution in which are centralized French savings banks deposits and the social insurance funds), were invited to take part in the conference. It is assumed that the financial details of the proposed merger under State auspices were finally agreed upon. The Bourse seems to take the view that shareholders in the independent railway companies will not lose by the merger; most railway shares advanced sharply today, in spite of the fact that the general market trend was weak.

The long delay in the promulgation of the railway decree has been due partly to differences within the Cabinet and partly to differences between the Government and the railway companies on the question of compensation. The National Union of Railwaymen demand that the State shall control the company by holding a majority of the shares, and that the trade unions and the present proprietors of the independent companies shall be equally represented on the board (on the analogy of the Council of the Bank of France). They demand also that in fixing the amount of compensation to be paid to the proprietors (in the way either of cash or of shares in the new company) due regard shall be had to past deficits. At the end of 1936 the cumulative deficit of the French railway systems amounted to over 27,000,000,000f. (say, £208,000,000), and in 1938, in spite of the fare increases, and allowing for the coordination and rationalization which to be put in hand, the deficit will still amount to close on 4,000,000,000f. (£30,000,000).

It may be assumed that these factors have had the constant attention of the Government. At the same time, of course, they cannot overlook the legitimate interests of the investors who have put their savings into railway stocks and bonds.

At the conclusion of the conference late this evening M. Chautemps declared that everything was going well and that the question would be settled at tomorrow's Cabinet meeting.

Auto Union Votes

of these days he will stop flying in the face of the inevitable and he will be willing to accord to his employes the rights that are theirs and when he does you won't have to organize the Ford employes, they will flock into your union."

Mr. Lewis asserted that from small beginnings the C. I. O. had been instrumental in organization of the automobile, steel, textile, ship building, glass and other industries "until there is marching today here in America the mightiest and most militant organization of workmen this country has ever seen and the members of the affiliated organizations substantially exceed the membership of the A.F. of L., which has been pecking away at these industries for more than fifty years."

The C. I. O. has no quarrel with the A.F. of L. as such, he declared, but it ill behooved the members of the federation to "lend their puny strength to the tremendous strength of the corporations of this country in fighting the C. I. O. and trying to prevent its constituent unions from establishing the right to organize and from establishing collective bargaining in those industries where the A.F. of L. for a fifty-year period has an unbroken record of failure.

"If that is not a reprehensible dog-in-the-manger policy, I know nothing of the meaning of words," he added.

He asserted that during the General Motors Corporation strike negotiations Mr. Green "to his eternal shame and dishonor" called Governor Murphy of Michigan on the telephone "and demanded that the Governor not permit any agreement to be made in that conference."

Mr. Lewis added that at the time General Motors was turning down every suggestion made by the union.

"The traitor, Green, made that demand at that time under those circumstances," he went on.

"He lent his strength to those who were already strong and did not need his strength and from his drooling lips over that telephone he mouthed denunciation of the C. I. O. and the automobile workers which he will have time to think about when his soul is in purgatory.

"He proved himself worthless to the trust imposed upon him by labor and he shamed the 600,000 members of the United Mine Workers who had honored him in days gone by, who had recommended him to the A.F. of L. for the position he now holds.

"I suppose that all great movements in all countries have their traitors. The Irish people in their 700-year fight for liberty had their James Carey. The British Labor party had its Ramsay MacDonald. The patriots of the American Revolution had their Arnold whose first name was Benedict.

"Then labor in this country today, the American Federation of Labor and the United Mine Workers, have their own contemptible traitor, William Green. But be it said that on the third Tuesday of next January the delegates of the United Mine Workers of America will assemble in constitutional convention and at that time these delegates will deal with the case of William Greeen."

Mr. Lewis added that a "traitor" was merely a traitor "and cannot stop the onward progress of a great movement; he is merely an annoyance, something like a flea on a dog."

The resolution on the Ford unionization campaign was a composite of several which had been offered. It recited that the Ford company was the only outstanding one in the automobile industry that had not been unionized. It charged that most of the company's employes had been kept out of the union by "terroristic anti-labor policies" of the company.

"The Ford Motor Company, by its notorious speed-up system, absence of adequate lunch periods and general policy of planned insecurity, seeks to achieve greater production by motivating employes with fear of losing their jobs," the resolution stated. "As long as the Ford Motor Company remains open shop it constitutes a threat to maintaining any union wages and union conditions in General Motors, Chrysler and other automobile manufacturers and an open shop challenge to the U. A. W."

The resolution upholding sit-down strikes declared that the opposition to such strikes by employers was because they were effective. It was asserted that the sit-down strikes were characterized by extreme care not to damage plants.

Quotes Martin on Sit-Ins

The resolution quoted with approval from the report of Mr. Martin, who said:

"The sit-down strike was beyond a doubt the only method by which the workers in the automobile industry could have forced the employers, who were determined to disregard the law of the land, into entering real collective bargaining relationships.

"The stay-in strike was not only significant because it brought about collective bargaining in the automobile industry without loss of life, but it was also significant because of its singular effectiveness in stopping the very heartstrings of the industry.

"The stay-in strike will remain an effective weapon against employers who refuse to recognize the legal and moral rights of the workers to collective bargaining. In my opinion it will remain labor's most effective weapon against the autocracy of industry."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Great Ox of Learning

St. Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274), whose learning and sanctity were so great that in his day no one could equal him, had some brothers serving in the army of Emperor Frederick of Germany. These brothers, in an attempt to prevent the youthful Thomas from embarking on an ecclesiastical career, detained the young scholar in the fortress of Rocca Secca for 2 years. At the instance of his sister, three great books were smuggled to the captive: the Bible, Aristotle's Metaphysics, and Lomard's "Five Sentences," covering the whole body of theological doctrine of the time. St. Thomas committed all three books to memory. Pope Leo XIII named St. Thomas the Prince and Master of all scholastic doctors, while other popes applied the title of "The Great Ox of Learning" to him.

Mr. Roland Steer arrived in Sendai on September 1 to take over the management of the Rising Sun Petroleum Company office here from Mr. Reginald Divers, who has been transferred to Tokyo. He is living in the "Rising Sun" house at 53 Katahiracho.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Ankeney returned to Sendai recently from a year's furlough in the United States.

Mr. and Mrs. William Draper have moved from Sendai to Akita.

James Fesperman, Esther and Robert McKnight and Kenneth Stoudt have gone to Tokyo, where they will be enrolled in the American School.

Dr. Paul V. Taylor and Miss Gertrude Zenk are staying in Sendai at present. Dr. Taylor is a professor in Central China College, and Miss Zenk is under appointment to the same institution, but they will remain here indefinitely, pending favorable developments in the situation in China.

Dr. and Mrs. William G. Seiple have returned from a furlough in the United States. They will be in Sendai until about the end of this month, when they will move to Tokyo where Dr. Seiple will do some teaching in the Union Theological Seminary at Shinjuku. They expect to take up their residence temporarily at No. 3 Ichigaya, Daimachi, Ushigome-ku.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop and Mrs. Norman S. Binsted have left for a short furlough in the United States. They plan to return by about February of next year, after which they look forward to taking up their residence again in Sendai.

Miss Marie Leidal, of the Music Dept. of Miyagi College, has moved from Komegafukuro to No. 164 Higashi Sanbancho. Miss Zenk will be sharing that house with her for the time being.

Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Divers have been entertained at a number of farewell dinner parties in their honor during the past week or ten days. They are leaving for Tokyo on the 16th of this month, after which they will be at home at 67 Shin-Sakamachi, Akasaka-ku. During their year and a half of residence in Sendai they have taken a whole-hearted part in the life of the community, and they will be much missed.

Miss Catherine Pifer of Tokyo, the Rev. and Mrs. Marcus J. Engelmann and family of Aizu-Wakamatsu, and the Rev. and Mrs. W. Carl Nugent and family of Yamagata will be in Sendai for the annual meeting of the Japan Mission of the Evangelical and Reformed Church, to be held next week.

Britain To Extend Probation System

Christian Science Monitor

LONDON,—"Gentler Justice"—the system of lifting people up out of social troubles instead of throwing them down into jail—is soon to revolutionize fully British police court practice, The Christian Science Monitor learns on high authority.

Plans now being prepared at the Home Office represent the consummation of several years' earnest thinking by persons who have realized the importance of extending the probation system, so that those who have made mistakes but cannot justifiably be classed as "criminals" should be given a helping hand rather than a prison sentence and the consequent stigma of being a "jail-fird."

Under the probation system a special court officer undertakes to keep a watchful eye on the guilty person and steer his or her activities into worthier channels. While this system has for some years been increasingly applied in the case of youthful offenders, it has been employed relatively little in adult cases. The preparations now being made for insuring that in future every possible case is treated in this way, form the next stage in this important social revolution..

Latest Moves

The extent of these new preparations shows clearly how strongly this question has now come to the fore. Latest moves include:

1. Overhaul by the Home Office of the probation system, in preparation for its extension.

2. Strong recommendations to magistrates to make fuller use of the system and to extend it to adult cases.

3. Recognition in Parliamentary statute of the important position of the probation officer in police court mechanism.

4. Establishment of a special training college for probation officers and raising of the standard for applicants.

The effect of these developments will naturally not be apparent to the public for some little time; public interest at the moment is focused upon another important factor in this social change—an act of Parliament which has just received the Royal Assent.

This act provides that on and after October 1, this year, all matrimonial cases now dealt with by magistrates will be heard before special Domestic Courts. The aim of the law is to compose differences between husbands and wives and reduce the number of separation orders, thus remedying the situation that caused nearly 2000 husbands to be sent to prison last year for failing to pay maintenance in connection with such orders.

The act provides that the public shall not be admitted to the Domestic Courts. It is also provided that, in case the probation officer should fail to effect conciliation the Lord Chancellor shall prescribe new rules of procedure for the courts.

Probation Officer's Status

More significant, however, for the student of social advancement is the fact that, the Home Office declares, the act recognizes and regularizes for the first time the position of the probation officer. He used to be an auxiliary, but now he becomes a part of police court machinery.

"Our aim now is full service." It was in these terms that a Home Office spokesman summed up the official attitude to the reforms.

Full service means more officers, extended service of women officers, better training for officers, increased use of officers.

Already 20,000 persons a year are placed under the care of probation officers. This figure represents a great advance; (there are, in fact, no previous figures issued with which to compare it); but it is mostly composed of juvenile cases. It should, it is said, be doubled in the future.

Increase Women Officers

There are 950 probation officers in England and Wales. Of these 400 are whole-time workers, and one third of these are women.

Although almost every court has the services of such an officer, there are still 300 courts that do not have the services of women officers. It is important that this number should be increased because otherwise the "gentler justice" system would not be of as much assistance to women as to men; woman, it is thought, would not have so much opportunity of keeping out of jail.

There are now twice as many applicants for probationer posts as there were three years ago. The standard is much higher. The pay starts at £220 a year and can rise to as much as £500 a year. A compulsory superannuation scheme has been established. After 40 years service a man may become entitled to a pension of £240 a year and a woman to £160.

The first concern of the probation officer is the supervision of the adult or juvenile offender who is placed on probation. He must see that the offender on probation observes conditions laid down by the court, must visit his home, watch his employment, become his friend, keep an oversight on his recreation. He is expected to act as conciliator between husband and wife. He may be responsible for inquiries into the adoption of children, and may assist in the administration of court charities.

VISITING DANCER GIVES FINAL RECITAL

La Meri with her protege, Ramgopal gave the last of her three recitals at the Hibiya Public Hall at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday. As in her other two performances given at the same hall Thursday, September 16 and Monday, September 20, the program was divided into three parts. Four Spanish Dances; Four Interpretative Dances; and Six Racial Dances.

The dances in the first part of the program were Spanish Dance No. 6, Garrotin, Farruca and La Corrida. Of these dances the one that was most appreciated was La Corrida, a dace of the bull-fighter.

The second part of the program opened with the Nymph of the Lake in which La Meri appeared attired in a soft costume of blue-green georgette with long golden hair. The dancer gave a fine interpretation of this graceful dance in which the mood was in absolute contrast to the preceding, La Carrida. This was followed by Passipied, by La Meri, and Prelude Herique, a modern interpretative dance in the Prelude to the opera La Habanera, by Raoul Laparra, given by Ramgopal. Ramgopal gave this dance with fine technique and was received with great applause.

The last dance in the second part of the program was Hypnotism Charlataneque, a very original dance in which La Meri was dressed entirely in black with black gloves with shining silver lines along the fingers and up the back of her hands. When the curtain rose the stage was empty and as the music started the hands appeared from behind the drapes at the left of the stage.

The last part of the program consisted of Wara Srikandi and Rsi Bisma by La Meri and Ramgopal, Lasyanatana by La Meri, Indra by Ramgopal, Three Devil Dances by La Meri, Tamborita and Tinikling. Ramgopal's interpretation of Indra was received so enthusiastically that he was compelled to repeat the dance. The dance, however, which received the greatest acclaim from the audience was Tinikling a popular dance from the Philippine Islands.

The program closed with two dances that were not on the program one given by Ramgopal in answer to many requests, and one given by La Meri, the difficult Japanese dance Echigo Jishi. La Meri showed her remarkable ability as a dancer in the two movements of this dance which she has learned since her arrival in Japan.

Miss Shizuyo Miyauchi

TO GIVE BEETHOVEN EVENING

Miss Shizuyo Miyauchi, noted pianist will hold a Beethoven evening at the Hibiya Public Hall, at 7:30 p.m. October 12. This is her second recital since last year and she will play Sonate, Op. 14 No. 2; Sonate Op. 110, Sechs Bagatellen, Op. 126; Rondo A Capriccio, Op. 129 and Sonate (Appassioanata): op. 57. She graduated from the girls' high school attached to the Tokyo Prefectural Girls' Normal School and studied the piano at the Tokyo Academy of Music. However, her piano music was commenced in her childhood taught by Madam Junko Kanbe. Then she studied under the direction of Mr. Kohansky and entered the studio of Mr. Leo Sirota for some time. Now she is teaching piano at the detached school of the Tokyo Academy of Music.

People In Madrid

air battles in the clouds above them that morning, attend "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer," or James Cagney in "G Men." Nothing seems to entertain them more than to watch a lot of actors blazing away at one another with blank cartridges, and the scene in "Top Hat," where Fred Astaire, in one of his dances, uses his cane as a machine gun and shoots down a male chorus, is received rapturously at every showing. You might think that the Madrilenos went to the films for escape and would hardly enjoy pictures that dealt with a topic so close to home as, say, an air battle. Yet "The Hawk and the Eagle," a Paramount film of perhaps four years ago, which had some pretty grim scenes of aerial combat, is a great success here, and a picture showing an air raid, wherein the actors being bombed behaved unrealistically, became a local laugh riot, with the audience calling out ironic advice to the players on the screen. Incidentally, it is rather curious to note that several German films and such an imperialistic photoplay as "Rhodes" are being shown, and that at least two child vaudeville actresses are billed as 'The Spanish Shirley Temple."

There is so little that is encouraging in any account of modern warfare that it is worth returning to that aforementioned topic of the telephone building. In tales of the Next War and various narratives advocating American preparedness, horrendous accounts are invariably given of Manhattan Island being wrecked by bombs and our magnificent skyscrapers collapsing about what are left of our ears when struck by enemy shells. You are led to believe that nothing could be so unsafe as the caverns of Manhattan and that in case of war you should immediately flee for the countryside. Now the Telefonica is an American-built skyscraper; it has been the outstanding target for enemy shells, can be bombarded from three sides and, as I have said, it has been struck squarely 117 times. Certainly it has been severely damaged, with great holes torn in several of its floors and walls, and its facade damaged in many places. Yet it still stands boldly and essentially intact, work has never ceased within its walls and as yet no one has been killed in it. Its courageous staff, who have lived in the building since the outset of the siege have had enough time on their hands to figure that, with the amount of damage the 117 shells have done, it would take at least 6,500 shells to destroy the Telefonica.

Osaka Shosen Kaisha To Add 2 Liners To Japan - Siam Service

The Osaka Shosen Kaisha which has put a number of up-to-date vessels on their services is to add two most modern cargo-and-passenger ships the Bangkok Maru and the Saigon Maru to its fleet and put them on the Japan-Siam run which is being operated with two steamers at present.

Giving due consideration to the necessity of crossing a bar when entering and clearing the port of Bangkok, these ships have been designed to keep afloat on a relatively shallow draft even under full load. The passenger accommodation is capable of taking care of twenty first class and fifty third class passengers. Abundant ventilation and natural illumination without glare of the tropical sun are some of the many features that make these boats especially desirable choice for travelers in the semi-tropics.

Following are the figures for both the Bangkok Maru and Saigon Maru:

Gross register	5,500 tons
Net register	4,000 tons
Between perpendiculars	121.5 meters
Beam	17 meters
Molded depth	10 meters
Loaded draft	7 meters
Cargo capacity	10,000 cub. mt.
Top speed	17 knots
Engines	2 Diesel engines
Accommodation	20 1st class 50 3rd class

Whether Mr. Mellon's divorced wife, the Irish-born Mrs. Nora McMullen Mellon, who has been living in Virginia in recent years, was present was not announced. Absent, too, because of their age were the financier's two grandchildren, Ailsa, the four-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bruce, and Conover, the seven-month-old son of the Paul Mellons.

Among those in the family group were Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Mellon, nephew and niece of Mr. Mellon; Mr. and Mrs. Alan Magee Scaife, Howard Heinz and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hitchcock jr. Mr. Hitchcock, a famed polo player, is the son-in-law of W. L. Mellon.

The services, which lasted just under thirty minutes, were conducted by the minister of the church, the Rev. Stuart Nye Hutchinson, who for the third time in less than four years, was conducting the funeral of a son of Thomas Mellon. Richard B. Mellon died in December, 1933, and the oldest of the brothers who survived the first third of the twentieth century, J. R. Mellon, had followed him in death a few months later.

Obeying Mr. Mellon's wish, there was no eulogy. The only mention of him was a passing one during the final prayer and benediction.

"We thank Thee," said Dr. Hutchinson, "for his long life of devotion and service to this city of his birth, and to this nation to which he gave so unstintedly of what he was and had. May his life stir coming generations to thus serve their day and generation by their will, O God. We rejoice in the Christian faith in which he was reared and which he professed and for the immortal hope which was his."

Of those who filled the church only a few, perhaps not more than a score, knew that before the sun should go down, the world would be told of further "service" to the extent, perhaps, of hundreds of millions would be bequeathed to the public by Mr. Mellon in his last testament.

23d Psalm Is Read

The services began with an organ prelude by William Wentzell, who played Corelli's "Sarabande," Bach's "Arioso," Gluck's "Aria," Mozart's "Larghetto," and Bach's "Come, Soothing Death." The mixed choir, clad in black cassocks and white cottas, sang, "Abide With Me," and Dr. Hutchinson then preceded his prayer of invocation with a reading of the Twenty-third Psalm.

He then read a succession of Scriptural passages that had been Mr. Mellons' favorites:

Psalm xlvi, 1-7—"God is our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble." . . .

Psalm xxiv, 1-6—"The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world and they that dwell therein." . . .

John xxiv, 1-3—"Let not your heart be troubled. . . . In my father's house are many mansions."

Romans viii, 38-39—"Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth," . . .

I Corinthians xv, 35-43—"But some men will say, How are the dead raised up? . . .

Matthew xxv, 34-40—"Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." . . .

Revelation xxi, 1-4—"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth." . . .

Revelation xxii, 4-7—"And they shall see his face, and his name shall be in their foreheads." . . .

Cemetery Service Private

To conclude, the choir sang "Lead, Kindly Light," the minister spoke the final prayer, and to the sonorous tones of Chopin's funeral march the cortege to Allegheny Cemetery, only a few blocks distant, got under way. There the services were private and brief. The vault wherein the coffin was placed was called a temporary one, but, like everything in which the Mellons had a hand, it bore an enduring aspects.

Visitors Increased By 19,951 For First Six Months Over '36

The official figures just released respecting alien arrivals in Japan during the first half-year of 1937 show that an aggregate of 19,951 foreign travelers came here resulting in an increase by 2,866 or 14.4 per cent over the figures for the corresponding period last year. Arrivals from the United States were 4,751; from Great Britain 3,176; from Germany 811 and from British India 657. Transit passengers are not included in the statistics.

Authentic figures for the month of July and after have not been published yet but there is every reason to expect a voluminous increase of these figures all round owing to the arrival of delegates from great many countries of the world for the Seventh Bi-annual World Conference of the World Federation of Education associations that was convened in Tokyo in early August; to the holding of the America-Japan Swimming Contest, the America-Japan Track and Field Events and other international gathering on the one hand and, on the other, to the heavy traffic of holiday makers who are being attracted to Japan in increasing number summer after summer.

The beauty of Nature in the autumn in Japan and the attractions of the seasonal events are too well known and have been already described by the pens of poetical artists and painted by the brushes of the pictorial artists. And, as the autumn departs to usher in the winter, the whole country is turned into a ground for winter sports and not only lures the residents out of doors to indulge in the outdoor pastimes but attracts a large number of snow birds from other countries also. Visitors to Japan for the sports will notice that, with the approaching Olympic meet in sight, all Japan is taking to athletic activities with redoubled vigor.

Shanghai Bombing

Mr. Billingham had left the store by the Nanking Road entrance, in which event he would certainly be dead, the writer ran to the front windows and looked down through the still swirling powder smoke upon a scene of the utmost horror and devastation.

Scores were lying dead, while others with the ghastliest wounds were attempting to drag themselves away from the street, covered with broken glass, shattered masonry and the wrecks of automobiles.

Returning to his parked automobile, the writer found Mr. Billingham had been able to crawl that far and was in a state of collapse in the rear seat. I was driving him up Bubbling Well Road toward a physician's office when I encountered a Red Cross ambulance. I turned my car squarely across the path of the ambulance and forced it to halt.

While the ambulance attendant, a Briton, was attempting to stanch Mr. Billingham's wounds, I hastened to a doctor's office. The doctor was out. When I returned, both the automobile with Mr. Billingham and the ambulance had disappeared.

The whole district was in a panic-stricken uproar, but finally a British subject stopped his car and took the writer to several hospitals. Mr. Billingham was finally located at the Country Hospital. The doctors found him then too seriously suffering from shock for any examination or operation.

After ten years in the United States Marine Corps—three of which were spent in the Far East—Anthony Billingham entered newspaper work because his love of adventure was not yet satisfied. Since joining the staff of The New York Times in 1936, he has had his share, having covered thousands of miles, often with the greatest difficulty, in search of news in war-torn China.

By airplane, on foot, and even in a locomotive cab, Billingham has "covered China." He was reporting the war at Tientsin when the first Japanese shells raked Shanghai. Dropping the Northern assignment, he raced with Hallett Abend, The New York Times chief correspondent in China, nearly 1,000 miles on nine trains and four steamers to reach the stricken city.

A tall, powerfully built man, with light brown hair and laughing eyes, his military bearing reveals where he received his training. Even at ease and in civilian clothes, he looks like a "devil dog." Most of his military service was in Nicaragua, Tahiti and the Far East.

Born in Nashville, Tenn.

His nearest relative is an uncle, James A. Billingham of Orlean, Va. He is a native of Nashville, Tenn., where he was born on Feb. 2, 1902.

Mr. Billingham first enlisted in the marine corps in December, 1925. He was on duty in Nicaragua in 1927 and in Shanghai first in 1930. He reenlisted in the corps in 1932, and was assigned to duty at Tahiti. He went to China in 1933 and remained until he was honorably discharged as a corporal on March 4, 1935.

Mr. Billingham, who speaks several languages, joined the staff of The Times on Jan. 1, 1936. Previous he made a tour of the new State of Manchoukuo, during the course of which he studied various armed Chinese forces. From his own military background he reached the conclusion that "the Chinese is born with all the fundamental qualities that go to make a soldier." This, he felt, was particularly true of those under Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek.

Abend Is Chief Correspondent

Mr. Abend has served as chief correspondent for The New York Times in China since 1927, a period marked by turbulence and revolution. At the outset he saw the establishment of the supremacy of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and the beginning of the Central Government of Nanking. He has remained to witness—and report—the internal strife that followed and the gradual encroachment of the Japanese.

Mr. Abend went to China in the early Spring of 1926 after having served as reporter and editor of newspapers in the United States.

Mr. Abend, 51 years old, is of German descent. He was born in Portland, Ore. He attended Stanford University for three years and while there published three small volumes of verse and did considerable writing for college publications.

He worked as a cub reporter on a newspaper in Spokane, Wash., and later served for four years as managing editor of The Idaho Statesman at Boise. From there he went to The Los Angeles Times, where he was city editor for a long period. He then worked on a newspaper in Honolulu, leaving there to become a freelance writer in China.

Mr. Abend speaks and reads various Chinese dialects. He has a notable collection of jade and ivory. He is a close friend of some of the most distinguished Chinese families.

In 1930 he wrote and published a study of the Chinese situation, entitled "Tortured China," regarded as an unusually accurate account of conditions in China in that period. In 1936 he and Mr. Billingham wrote the book "Can China Survive?"

New Winged Terror

Harvard entomologists now claim that the New England buckeye butterfly is to be listed in the "killer" class of nature.

To prove their claim they have photographed a butterfly of that type in deadly combat with a wasp. The scientists say the butterfly is capable of killing wasps and even small birds. The normal diet of the butterfly, however, is milkweed blossoms and nectar.

Close Second

At a luncheon of newspaper men, the following toast was offered: "The ladies! Second only to the press in the dissemination of news!"

Social and Personal Notes

By special request, Maritza, concert harpist, will include a group of folk music on her eighteenth century Irish harp at her joint recital with Michio Miyagi, noted koto soloist, at the Meiji Seimei Auditorium, Sunday, September 26, at 7:30.

MARITZA-MIYAGI JOINT RECITAL

Members of the Ueno Koto Club, the Japan Harp Society, the Yokohama Koto Club and other organizations sponsoring harp and koto music will attend the joint recital to be given by Maritza, concert harpist, and Michio Miyagi, Japan's foremost koto soloist, at the Meiji Seimei Auditorium Sunday, September 26, at 7:30 p.m.

Maritza will play several new selections on the French harp, including "Legend" by Henriette Renie, "Fraicheur," by Salzedo, and "Marche Militaire," by Hasselmans.

Michio Miyagi's koto group on the program will feature "Haru no Umi," "Seoto," "Sakura" and "Tanima no Mizuguruma," all his own compositions. By special request, Maritza will also render folk music on the small eighteenth century Irish harp. This will be Maritza's final appearance in Japan, as she sails October 2 on the "Hakozaki Maru" for Singapore.

NEW ADDRESS

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Young have moved from their former residence in Takinogawa and are now living at No. 65 Miyashita-cho, Koishikawa, where their telephone number is Otsuka (86) 1869.

AMERICAN SCHOOL

At recent meeting of the Student Council of the American School the following officers were elected for the ensuing school year: President, Harvey Daniels; Vice-President, Jean Mayer and Secretary, Richard Moss.

The complete Council, which is chosen from the upper school, has the following personnel: Seniors: Harvey Daniels, Jean Mayer and Homer Pearce: Juniors: Ernest Carlson and Richard Moss; Sophomores: Jean Jorgensen and Horst Nothmann; Freshmen: Wesley Allinsmith and Helen Durgin and Junior High: Jerry Downs.

This Council meets with the Principal at frequent intervals and is given a share in the discussion and solving of problems which relate directly to the students themselves. It is therefore the most important student organization in the life of the school.

The classes of the upper school have met and elected the following officers: Senior Class: President, John Holton; Vice-President, Jean Mayer; Secretary, Harvey Daniels; Treasurer, Joseph Takata and Sponsor, Mrs. Jorgensen; Junior Class: President, George Shimizu; Vice-President, June Stewart-Scott; Secretary, Frank Hinokuma; Treasurer, Richard Moss and Sponsor, Mr. Pearson; Sophomore Class: President, Maurice Horn; Vice-President, Kenneth Lamott; Secretary, Margaret Covell; Treasurer, Henry Fisher and Sponsor, Mr. Evans; Freshman Class: President, Kenneth Stoudt; Vice-President, Daniel Stauffer; Secretary, Mutsu Suzuki; Treasurer, Jean Stannard and Sponsor, Mr. Heinlein; Junior High School: President, Jerry Downs; Vice-President, Mary McCorkle: Secretary, Baldwin Eckel; Treasurer, Alexander Yusha and Sponsor, Miss McKay.

The school has opened with what appears to be a record enrollment, the registration at the present time being 159, which is larger than it has been for many years.

The new kindergarten has made a successful beginning, and occupies attractive quarters which have been decorated and furnished especially for its use. In the high school a course in zoology has been added to the curriculum.

Stalin More Closely

It is worthy of note that in the matter of the execution of Tukhachevsky and seven other generals the normal panel of three judges was widened to include high ranking officers of the Army.

The mental strain of the double crisis this year does not seem to have told visibly on Stalin. Foreigners who stood within a few score yards of him during the May Day parade in Red Square or the air demonstration in mid-August, even with glasses could not detect the lightest indication of tension.

Hull Statement On China Crisis

N. Y. Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23—Following is the text of a statement issued tonight by Secretary Hull concerning the policies of the United States Government in the Far East:

At his press conference on Aug. 17, the Secretary of State announced that (1) legislative action to make available funds for purposes of emergency relief necessitated by the situation in the Far East had been asked and that (2) this Government had given orders for a regiment of marines to prepare to proceed to Shanghai. The Secretary then discussed at some length the principles of policy on which this Government was proceeding.

The situation at Shanghai is in many respects unique. Shanghai is a great cosmopolitan center, with a population of over 3,000,000, a part of which has been developed by the nationals of many countries, at which there have prevailed mutually advantageous contacts of all types and varieties between and among the Chinese and people of almost all other countries of the world. At Shanghai, there exists a multiplicity of rights and interests which are of inevitable concern to many countries, including the United States.

Aiding Removal of Citizens

In the present situation, the American Government is engaged in facilitating in every way possible an orderly and safe removal of American citizens from areas where there is special danger. Further, it is the policy of the American Government to afford its nationals appropriate protection primarily against mobs or other uncontrolled elements. For that purpose it has for many years maintained small detachments of armed forces in China, and for that purpose it is sending the present small reinforcement. These armed forces there have no mission of aggression. It is their function to be of assistance toward maintenance of order and security. It has been the desire and the intention of the American Government to remove these forces when performance of their function of protection is no longer called for, and such remains its desire and expectation.

Problems Outside of Far East

The issues and problems which are of concern to this government in the present situation in the Pacific area go far beyond merely the immediate question of protection of the nationals and interests of the United States. The conditions which prevail in that area are intimately connected with and have a direct and fundamental relationship to the general principles of policy to which attention was called in the statement of July 16, which statement has evoked expressions of approval from more than fifty governments. This government is firmly of the opinion that the principles summarized in that statement should effectively govern international relationships.

When there unfortunately arises in any part of the world the threat or the existence of serious hostilities, the matter is of concern to all nations. Without attempting to pass judgment regarding the merits of the controversy, we appeal to the parties to refrain from resort to war. We urge that they settle their differences in accordance with principles which, in the opinion not alone of our people, but of most peoples of the world, should govern in international relationships. We consider applicable throughout the world, in the Pacific area as elsewhere, the principles set forth in the statement of July 16. That statement of principles is comprehensive and basic. It embraces the principles embodied in many treaties, including the Washington conference treaties and the Kellogg-Briand Pact of Paris.

Peace Steps Urged

From the beginning of the present controversy in the Far East we have been urging upon both the Chinese and the Japanese Governments the importance of refraining from hostilities and of maintaining peace. We have been participating constantly in consultation with interested governments directed toward peaceful adjustment. This Government does not believe in political alliances or entanglements, nor does it believe in extreme isolation. It does believe in international cooperation for the purpose of seeking through pacific methods the achievement of those objectives set forth in the statement of July 16. In the light of our well-defined attitude and policies and within the range thereof, this Government is giving most solicitous attention to every phase of the Far Eastern situation, toward safeguarding the lives and welfare of our people and making effective the policies—especially the policy of peace—in which this country believes and to which it is committed.

This Government is endeavoring to see kept alive, strengthened and revitalized, in reference to the Pacific area and to all the world, these fundamental principles.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Walked 5,000 Miles To School

Gus Gary aims to get a college education no matter what the obstacles are. Last school year he was not able to live at Harding College in Searcy, Arkansas, but the fact that he lived 12 miles away and had no means of transportation, did not stop him. He undertook to walk the distance twice a day and hoofed a total of 5,000 miles, in all kinds of weather, to and from school during the year. Gus is taking a year off selling magazines to enable him to enter college again next year, and by the time he finishes college he will have walked a distance equal to a trip around the world.

Memorial Service Held

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SHANGHAI, Sept. 23—On the Autumn Equinox, the first memorial service for the war dead since the outbreak of current hostilities was held today at the Nishi-Honganji Buddhist Temple, Chapoo Road. Present at the ceremony were many officers of the Japanese Army and Navy, members of the Japanese Embassy and Consulate-General here, and a number of Japanese residents.

Scale Of Living

"well to do." That seemed a curious word to be employed by a regime that theoretically disdains private riches and has so often been severely contemptuous of the well to do created by other forms of society.

However, the theorists will not have to worry very soon about the problem created by the well-to-do collective farmer. No general figures are available as to the wages and rewards of the communal plowmen, but you can get some idea of what they are by some figures printed in Pravda on June 30 in relation to the wages on a collective farm near Moscow.

Farmer's Yearly Earnings

In 1935 the workers on this farm earned three pounds of grain a day and 29 kopecks in money. Twenty-nine kopecks is less than 7 cents at the official rate of exchange, but it will not buy more than about 2 cents' worth of goods.

Last year the workers on the same farm earned one-third of a pound of grain a day and 2 cents a day in cash value. If a farmer worked every day in the year, snow rain or shine, his total income in practical cash would be $7.30 for twelve months, and his present payment in grain would be about enough to keep a chicken alive.

This farm was cited as a horrible example, intended to illustrate the results of mismanagement, but the existence of such wage scales is suggestive of the general standards of pay on the collective farm.

Conditions may be better than they were. They are still appalling.

You have all the concomitants of an ordinary economic system. You will see ragged boys and men looking longingly into bakery shop windows for cheap cakes and rolls they cannot buy, and, on the same street, you will visit a restaurant crowded with Russians tossing out fistfuls of greasy bills in payment for champagne.

This growing disparity in the economic status of the population probably explains the new respect for clothes, the new emphasis on decoration and finery. It may also help to account for a great many other things that are happening in Russia.

I wondered how the piece-work system could be applied to the collective farms. Ninety-nine per cent of all the Russian farm land is now collectivized. In America, the custom is to pay farmhands by the month, regardless of the work performed. Not in Russia.

On the collective farms, all the farmers are paid on a piece-work basis. A certain norm is set for an honest Soviet day's work, depending on the character of the soil, the equipment and other individual circumstances. A man or woman must milk so many cows, plow or plant so many acres in a normal day's work.

If the laborer does two days' work in one day, he is paid for two days' work, and, conversely, if he does only half a day's work in a full day on the job, he is paid only for the half day. He may work every day for a full month on the farm and get paid for only fifteen days' production.

Not only that, but deduction of 10 per cent will be made from the wages of farm laborers whose work is considered to be below standard. Premiums of 10, 15 and 20 per cent are paid to workers, to managers and to whole brigades when the sowing, or the reaping, is completed in unusually quick time. You can see that there must be plenty of hopping on a Soviet farm.

A Moral Change in Russia

The intangible moral changes that have come over Russia in the years I have been traveling here are marked and significant. I do not mean merely the restrictions on divorces, or the new attitude toward the family or the admitted evidence of a revival of religion, or the changed emphasis on the value of maternity.

The amended divorce laws involve only a penalty of $10 for the first divorce, $25 for the second and so on, with the additional injunction that you must notify your spouse that you are contemplating a divorce. Formerly divorce was free and casual. It is still cheap, quick and popular.

The new laws forbidding abortions are not so much an acknowledgment of the sacredness of maternity as they are a boast that Russia is now able to feed her increasing population and has need of material for building socialism and creating armies.

I mean something less ponderable. You feel these impalpable spiritual changes very strongly. I think they come mostly from a sense of further order and increased discipline. Their whole effect is to make life seem more normal as we, in democratic countries, conceive of normality.

Life More Orderly at Bottom

That is another paradox in the Russian situation. As life is violently disturbed at the top with executions and arrests, it becomes outwardly more orderly at the bottom. People go about their business and their play as they do everywhere else in the world.

The girls and boys hold hands and go to dances in the evening. There are now dozens of dance restaurants in Moscow, and even the movie theaters provide floors for the fox-trotters.

The Soviet woman bedecks herself with cosmetics and has her fingers manicured and highly rouged at a beauty parlor. There is a waiting line at every beauty parlor and barber shop, and many of the barbers are women.

The other evening I saw a comrade, dressed in shirt-sleeves and a pair of pants sadly soiled with the grime of his hard labor, seated fastidiously at a table in a beauty parlor while the manicurist attended to his nails and about a dozen women customers waited their turn. This is something new here, something that did not exist and could not happen a few years ago.

The arrangement of society is solidifying into distinct classes and the distinction here, as elsewhere is based on money.

The general level of dress is makeshift and shabby, but within the limits of this poverty of material there is an enormous range of difference, a difference, I should say, much greater than you would find between the chic promenades and the slums of New York.

Discipline, ideas of service, are unrecognizably improved. Moscow's streets are spotlessly clean; the shop windows are spruced up; the lines of people waiting to buy commodities are smaller and wholly orderly.

Plane Lands Alone Under Automatic Electric Control

DAYTON, Ohio, Aug. 25—Army airmen studied today the first successful automatic landing of an airplane for its further development toward a long-sought goal of the air corps—complete blind flying.

Engineers at Wright Field hoped the blind flying apparatus, small enough to be "packed in a small-sized locker trunk," might hasten the time when a plane could be sent far distances without a pilot.

A cargo-type plane was brought down to a three-point landing yesterday by means of electric-mechanically operated controls. The flight was conducted by Captains Carl Crane and George V. Holloman and Raymond Stout, civilian project engineer.

The device controls engine speed, angle of descent, turning and necessary "banking," the officers reported. With the exception of the gyro-pilot, all of the equipment was designed by Wright Field technicians.

Sheep On 600-Mile Trek To Pastures Of Alberta

Christian Science Monitor

CALGARY, Alta.—A 600-mile trek to bring a flock of 1200 sheep from the drought-stricken district of Swift Current, Saskatchewan, to Vermillion in Alberta has been undertaken by Clarence and Henry Tinney and John Wilson.

These herders from Swift Current are having little difficulty in driving the sheep while they ride behind the flock in a truck which carries their equipment and food for the journey, for they have the expert assistance of two well-trained sheep dogs who do most of the herding of this large flock en route to a district where there is ample pasturage.

Vittorio Mussolini Arrives At Hollywood

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

HOLLYWOOD, Sept. 25—While Il Duce, his father, made a triumphant entry into Germany today, Vittorio Mussolini, eldest son of the Italian Premier, tonight arrived here almost unobserved after a hurried dash across the United States by plane. Accompanied by two bodyguards, Vittorio was skirted away from the air field immediately after the transcontinental liner taxied to a stop.

Here to study American screen productions for about three weeks, he will stay as guest of Mr. Hal Roach, producer and distributor of short feature comedies. He intimated, however, that he may lengthen his stay and collaborate with Mr. Roach on several films.

Dr. Phelps Chooses His 'Books of Year'

N. Y. Times

POINT-AUX-BARQUES, Mich., Aug. 29.—Dr. William Lyon Phelps, professor emeritus of Yale University, named his "Books of the Year" here today, his own selection of the books he most enjoyed in the last twelve months and that he considers best worth reading.

He commented that no novel published during the year "towered impressively above the others" as did "Gone With the Wind," by Margaret Mitchell, published by Macmillan in 1936.

"Although I am more interested in the literary merit of books than I am in their commercial success," he said, "it is a interesting fact that 'Gone With the Wind' reached a sale of 1,000,000 copies less than six months after the date of publication. So far as I know, no other new book has ever attained that figure within so brief a time."

He held up "The Flowering of New England," by Van Wyck Brooks, as of high excellence in the field of literary criticism, saying he was all the more pleased to pay homage to this work, because he thought Mr. Brooks' earlier "The Ordeal of Mark Twain" was erroneous in its main thesis.

Dr. Phelps said the "most intellectual novel" he had read during the year was Laura Riding's "A Trojan Ending," but "its austerity, and dubiety in fulfilling its purpose, will give to many readers more bewilderment than pleasure."

A literary event of the year, he said, was the appearance of Boswell's "Tour of the Hebrides" printed from his manuscript.

The complete list, given today in a lecture for the benefit of the Hubbard Memorial Hospital at Badaxe, follows:

Novels

EMMA, by Louis Paul. An admirable novel of contemporary American city life—friendship among women like the three musketeers.

A MIGHTY FORTRESS, by Le Grand Cannon Jr. Showing a career for dull preachers and how to make an unsuccessful marriage successful. A work of art.

NORTHWEST PASSAGE, by Kenneth Roberts. Romantic yarn of a superman in Colonial America. The forest scenes are better than the urban.

SHINING SCABBARD, by R. C. Hutchinson. Very remarkable book, quite superior to most contemporary fiction. The title accurately describes the hollow hero.

THE DEVIL AND DANIEL WEBSTER, by S. V. Benet. A masterpiece of legend and history, with present-day implications.

THE CRIME WAVE AT BLANDINGS, by P. G. Wodehouse. This is Wodehouse at his best, and his worst is very good. Humor as an end, not a means.

LIGHT WOMAN, by Zona Gale. The home and the penthouse. Much in little.

THE MISSING MINIATURE, by Erich Kaestner. Prescribed for bed-bound convalescents, and for all who need cheering up.

Biography

OLIVER CROMWELL, by W. C. Abbott. First volume of the best biography of the "Mystery Man."

LIFE WITH MOTHER, by Clarence Day. Just as good as "Life With Father." No more need be said.

EDWARD GIBBON, by D. M. Low. A worthy commemoration of the bicentennial of his birth. Full of good anecdotes.

PRESENT INDICATIVE, by Noel Coward. Showing there is no royal road.

LIFE OF PUSHKIN, by E. J. Simmons. A thoroughly satisfactory work.

LIFE OF GEORGE MOORE, by Joseph Hone. Excellent story of the career of a great writer.

WHITMAN, by Edgar Lee Masters. Clear-headed and sensible. Especially good on Walt's early youth.

SHOWMAN, by W. A. Brady. Exciting and hilarious from first page to last. Chronic excitement is the way to prolong life.

LETTERS OF FANNY BRAWNE TO FANNY KEATS. Our first opportunity to become acquainted with the woman Keats loved. She was worth knowing and worth loving.

LIFE OF JESUS, by Mauriac. Dynamic biography by a French novelist.

IN THE STEPS OF ST. PAUL, by H. V. Morton. A firts-class newspaper man who could not write a dull book if he tried.

Miscellaneous

BULWARK OF THE REPUBLIC, by Burton J. Hendrick. Very fine historical work on the Constitution and the Supreme Court. Serious but never dull.

THE FLOWERING OF NEW ENGLAND, by Van Wyck Brooks. Profound and brilliant. An honor to American literature.

PAGES FROM AN OXFORD DIARY, by Paul Elmer More. Final meditations on religion by one of America's greatest scholars and thinkers. An affecting farewell.

THE HIGHER LEARNING IN AMERICA, by President R. M. Hutchins. Food for thought with bones to pick.

ORCHIDS ON YOUR BUDGET; by Marjorie Hillis. Practical wisdom with definite remedies for common complaints.

THE CRUISE OF THE JOSEPH CONRAD, by Alan Villiers. By a deep-water sailor who is a literary artist.

HAVE YOU ANYTHING TO DECLARE? by Maurice Baring. Here anthology rises to consummate art.

HISTORY OF THE OLYMPIC GAMES, by John Kieran. From their origin to the present moment. By a scholarly sports writer who combines classical learning with American humor.

SMALL TALK, by Harold Nicolson. Brilliant conversation piece.

Of mystery story writers, Dr. Phelps said:—

"The following authors never let you down: Rex Stout, Carroll J. Daly, Agatha Christie, J. J. Farjeon, Patricia Wentworth, Ellery Queen, Rufus King, S. S. Van Dine, E. S. Gardner and H. M. McNeile (alas! that he is dead)."

French Tunnel To Alsace Speeds Reunion Process

Christian Science Monitor

PARIS—When the King, Louis XIV., in 1673, went to salute the province of Alsace, and to visit the city of Colmar, which had attached itself to France, he found the crossing of the Vosges an exceedingly difficult operation for the Royal coinue. Today, the President of the Republic, Albert Lebrun, has gone from Saint-Die to Sainte-Marie-aux-Mines—hitherto separated from each other by a whole day of travel, necessitating three changes of train—in less than half-an-hour.

The piercing of a tunnel through the immense mountains which divide Lorraine from Alsace, is a really notable fact in French relations with the disputed province. It is also a remarkable feat of engineering, for the tunnel, partly driven through solid granite, is the longest in France.

For Alsace, it marks a stage in the process of reunion with France. Alsace has characteristics of its own which in the opinion of some observers make it neither wholly French nor German. But it has been part of French territory for centuries, except for the period from 1871 to 1918, during which it was annexed to Germany.

But its communications with some of the neighboring regions in France have been deficient. The French maintain that it was the settled policy of Germany to isolate Alsace from France, and it was certainly helped by the existence of such natural barriers as the Vosges.

Other Tunnels Planned

The construction of this tunnel, which will be followed, when the financial situation permits, by others, is not only an appreciable economic advantage—it is the moral consecration of the return of Alsace to France.

Needless to say, the inauguration of the tunnel has also a military importance. French re-enforcements can now be rushed to Alsace, if ever they should be needed.

At present the railway under the mountain is a single-track line, but room is left for the eventual laying down of a second line. The length is nearly seven kilometers (about 4½ miles), of which three kilometers were bored through granite rock. The work proceeded on both sides of the mountain, and when the workers met in the middle it was found that the calculations had been almost exactly right. The difference between the reckoning and the reality was of less than two centimenters (about three-quarters of an inch). It is estimated that 6,500,000 hours of work have been put in on the tunnel.

Power and Waterways

The French Government does not mean to lose any opportunity of giving Alsace the opportunity of participating more and more in the life of the nation; and the present tunnel is, as the Ministerial spokesmen declared, merely a stage in the realization of projects which will fully incorporate the recovered province.

Albert Lebrun recalled that he had already visited the imposing barrage of Kembs on the Rhine, by which Alsace, and even Paris, obtains much of its electrical power. He had also opened the lateral canal which from Metz to Thionville prolongs the navigable waterways, and permits the rich mining and metallurgical basin of the Moselle to be linked up with the French canal system.

He emphasized the importance of what was being done for Alsace, declaring that the opening of the tunnel was a capital event in the economic development of the district. "The chain of the Vosges now exists only as a geographical entity, and not as an obstacle to the mutual expansion of two populations which it separated."

It is worth recalling that before the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, there was already a plan for such a tunnel; but the Germans naturally did not proceed with a project which would open a door in the huge wall on the French side. After 1919 it was hoped to proceed quickly, but the troubled financial history of the post-war years retarded the work.

Soviet Industry

tons had been delivered to the end of June.

The organ for heavy industry at the end of July published a sweeping general indictment of the situation, stating:

"While production of electrical energy, steel castigs, rolled steel, peat and aluminum have increased, not one industry has fulfilled the government plan. The number of breakdowns at electrical stations is still very large. The rate of steel production is quite unsatisfactory and cannot supply the needs of our economy.

"Machine factories continually get less metal than they should. One branch of industry gets behind, then drags another behind. Bad work of the coal and industry tells harmfully of metallurgy, which in turn delays machine construction."

This official organ of industry computed that in order to fulfil the second five-year plan, industries would have to increase their output in the second half of this year by the following percentages over the first half: electrical energy, 30 per cent; coal, 35; oil, 24; pig iron, 18; steel, 28; rolled steel, 43; cement, 53; copper, 85.

The situation in light industry since March has been even less satisfactory than in heavy industry. According to figures in the official press, total output in May was 9 per cent less than in December and production of sorely-needed cotton cloth fell off 18 per cent. Deliveries of cotton cloth in the first five months this year were 200,000,000 square meters short of the quota; hosiery was 25,000,000 pairs fewer than the plan called for and shoe production 2,000,000 pairs short.

Furthermore, it was charged that some mills, in an attempt to maintain quantity production, resorted to thinning of the fabrics by as much as 25 per cent, with the result that Moscow and Leningrad mills in five months turned out 100,000 yards of spoiled goods.

The automobile industry is in much better condition, although it is not attaining the levels set in the plan because, according to organ of heavy industry, "the chief board of the industry is unable to establish discipline in the factories and obtain the necessary materials."

In addition to the most important factors in the partial industrial paralysis—the shortage of basic materials and the fear of responsibility, confusion and buck-passing among the directors—there are many contributory elements.

Among these are what the press asserts is the "terrible state of equipment" due to abuse and overstraining of machines as a result of the Stakhanovite or speed-up system of piece work and the continuous wear and tear of operation by two or three shifts; the unduly large labor turnover because of disproportionate wages; the lack of discipline due to dissatisfaction over differences in living conditions of workers, specialists, Stakhanovites and bureaucrats.

This year's harvest is claimed to be the best in years and this fact, as I can testify from observations during more than 1000 miles of travel over the North Caucasus and Ukraine regions, provides a large bright spot in the prevailing gloom.

Even several weeks ago it was asserted that grain deliveries to the state had reached 4,000,000 tons, or double those of 1933, the previous record year for grain deliveries. Pravda stated that the "rich harvest increases the raw material resources of the food industry tremendously. The prospects are such that it may be confidently asserted that the food industry is guaranteed the materials for over-fulfilling the plan."

But as the organ for heavy industry observed, it is a "gigantic problem" for industry to make up for its present lag in the remainder of the year.

French Price Rise Continues Despite Contrary Efforts

Christian Science Monitor

PARIS.—Efforts in France to hold down prices have a restraining effect, but they cannot prevent the upward trend. The first Front Populaire Government of Leon Blum and Vincent Auriol fell because prices augmented too rapidly, and the workers, who believed they had received genuine wage increases, found that in reality purchasing power had not increased, but rather diminished.

This disillusionment, added to the financial and economic difficulties caused by excessive spending and higher costs of production, made the position of the Front Populaire Government untenable. M. Georges Bonnet, in a series of drastic measures—increased taxation, decreased expenditure—decreed exactly the opposite of that which brought M. Auriol to an impasse.

Living Costs Up 30 P. C.

But the question of prices remains one of the most perplexing. How can prices be kept down to their former level when the State itself thinks it proper to raise its prices, so to speak, in asking for more taxes? The public transport companies are, in Paris, ordered by the Government to raise their fares to prevent a substantial loss. It would seem invidious then to declare that dealers shall not raise their prices.

In point of fact it is estimated that already the cost of living has risen by at least 30 per cent. This is natural, for the cost of production has been increased by the introduction of the 40-hour week indiscriminately in all industries, and above all by the mentality of the worker who, misled by agitators, was persuaded that it was meritorious to produce as little as possible. In addition, the purchase of raw materials abroad costs much more in francs.

So that while the original decree regulating prices seemed fairly rigid, in actual working it was defective, and it has how been whittled down. Amendment followed amendment. Originally, it prohibited manufacturers and merchants from raising their prices above those prevailing on June 28 without the consent of the local or national price committees.

It was alleged that the effect on business was disastrous. Authorization for a raise, however, legitimate, took two weeks to deliver. What should traders do in the meantime if they chose to obey the law? Sell at a loss? Or close their shops?

Devaluation Virtue Lost

In reality prices were widely raised, despite the decree. The Finance Minister, whose conceptions are liberal, did not appear to be sure that coercion was applicable to prices. It was announced that certain limited increases might be automatically made. But these concessions were regarded as insufficient. The associations of merchants insisted that prices should first be raised, and then submitted to the committees for approval. The committees, in short, will deal with the fait accompli, and will only withhold their approval if the advances are deemed unreasonable.

It is to be trusted, however, that there will be a self-denying ordinance adopted by French traders; for an essential difficulty in France has been that the purchasing power of the franc was lower in the country than abroad. French prices were, it is estimated, 20 per cent above world prices. The whole point about devaluation is that it should bring down French prices to the world level. This means that the rises, in the new currency, should be small and gradual. If they are considerable, then France will again be one of the dearest countries in the world, and will be handicapped accordingly.

Maritza, Miyagi Give Joint Recital

Mme. Maritza, the well known French harpist and Michio Miyagi, Japan's greatest koto player appeared together in a joint recital at the Meiji Seimei Hall Sunday. This is the first time that the harp and the koto, two ancient classical instruments have been played on the same program.

The program opened with Mme. Maritza, dressed in her silver grey gown specially designed for the harp, playing Chanson Dans la Nuit, on the French Harp. In the first part of the program Mme. Maritza played Francheur by Salzado; Night Breeze by Salzedo; Whirlwind by Salzedo; Legende by Renie, Maytime by Romberg and March Militaire by Hasselmans.

Some of Maritza's selections were repeated from her last recital but among the new numbers were Fraischeur and Legende. These two pieces stood out as the finest of the evening, and Maritza's skill as one of the world's finest harpists was shown in her charming interpretation of the difficult Legende.

The second part of the program consisted of four selections on the koto by Michio Miyagi, composed by himself. In the first, Tanima no Mizuguruma, or the Waterwheel in the Valley, he was assisted by Mr. Hirokado Reifu, a noted performer on the shakuhachi. This was followed by Haru no Umi, the Sea in Spring also accompanied by Mr. Reifu; Seoto, Running Waters and Sakura, the Cherry. In the last two numbers Mr. Miyagi was assisted by his neices, Seoto, being rendered on two kotos and Sakura on three. Mr. Miyagi's interpretations of these selections were greatly appreciated by the audience and his skill is doubly amazing when one considers that he is blind.

The last art of the program was given by Maritza on the 18th century Irish harp and consisted of a group of Irish and Scotch folk songs, including Believe Me if all Those Endearing Young Charms, Highland Ladie, Annie Layrie, Codin' Through the Rye and The Last Rose of Summer. Maritza also gave Gluck's Minuet, the Dance of the Marionettes and Mazurka by Scheucker. In this last group of selections Maritza wore the green and silver gown with the silver bonnet. The songs, known to the foreign and Japanese audience alike, received great applause.

Maritza's charming stage personality and her delightful rendering of these pieces was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience.

Maritza will leave Japan for Singapore at the end of the week. She has bookings for concerts through the Malay States, from where the will go to India and back to Paris.

Stabilized Money Experiment Shows Laudable Results

Christian Science Monitor

GENEVA.—The international experiment in currency stabilization initiated last autumn by Britain, France and the United States has been followed by "remarkable stability" on the part of the exchange rates of a large number of countries, according to a report issued by the League of Nations economic section.

Although the whole system of international cooperation instituted in the monetary field last September is of a day-to-day character, its positive achievements are none the less "of considerable significance."

These achievements are listed by the League's Economic Intelligence Service, in its report on "Money and Banking, 1936-37," released here. First, it is stated, the agreements averted the risk of competitive currency depreciation which might have followed the realignment of the chief currencies of the gold bloc.

Orderly Experiment

Secondly, the agreements provided the mechanism for an orderly international experiment. And while the parties to these agreements were only three in number, their currencies are those to which most others are directly or indirectly attached. Thirdly, the September (1936) arrangement was followed by a remarkable stability of exchange rates, until France again devalued her currency this summer.

When in September, 1936, the French Government decided to devalue the franc, its Treasury and those of United States and Britain declared their intention of pursuing a monetary policy designed "to maintain the greatest possible equilibrium in the system of international exchanges and to avoid to the utmost extent the creation of any disturbance of that system" by their "monetary action."

More specifically, the three governments undertook to use the "appropriate available resources" to avoid disturbing the new basis of the international exchange resulting from the adjustment of the French franc, followed on the next day by the Belgian franc and by the Netherlands florin and the Swiss franc a month later. They also agreed to consult regularly with one another.

Narrow Fluctuation

Several tables released by the League Secretariat show with a completenes claimed to have been hitherto unobtainable, the narrow range within which fluctuation is now taking place in the exchanges of some 40 countries. These tables are considered an eloquent prelude to a promising chapter in the history of international finance.

In the course of an authoritative and searching analysis of the central monetary gold reserves of the chief Powers, the League Economic Intelligence Service reveals that Britain has more than doubled its reserves, while the United States and France record increases of 77.5 and 41.9 per cent, respectively.

At the end of March, the United States, French and British reserves were in fact, 6835, 1681 and 1531 millions of old gold dollars, respectively.

Economic recovery and increased Government expenditures on rearmament programs are causing interest rate to harden in a number of countries. In general, however, such rates have fallen to abnormally low level. In the case of the United States and Japan, for instance, the levels are unprecedented in their history. In several countries, the rates ruling in 1936 were lower than at any time since the last decade of the 19th century. Interest rates, it is remarked, do not therefore offer any impediment to economic recovery.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

The Little Man With The Big Thirst

Klemens Perkeo, dwarf of the Elector Karl Philip, was appointed by the latter as guardian of the Great Tun of Heidelberg. Perkeo was only 2 feet 4, but his thirst was gigantic. For 31 years (1720-1751), during which time he guarded the Great Tun, he was wont to drink 6 gallons of wine daily. His statue now stands near the Great Tun and his memory is extolled by German poets as that of the Man of Little Size but of colossal thirst.

The Two Sisters

The Twin Towers, of the captioned name, were erected by two shipwrecked sisters in the 7th century as a vow designed to save them from drowning. When aid arrived, one of the sisters reneged in spirit and was promptly drowned. The other sister, who escaped, later became the Abbess of Faversham and completed the structure. For many centuries past, captains of passing ships have dipped their topsails in reverence to her memory as soon as they came within sight of the towers.

Drive Against

lation of approximately a half million, I saw thousands of vacationing workers swimming and boating and living in rest houses which were formerly the palatial homes of wealthy merchants. Nude bathing, once a feature of Russian life, is now frowned upon and practiced only by young people in the villages. The men wear trunks and the girls trunks and brassiers, usually homemade but attractively setting off handsome figures.

Every city has numerous bathing beaches and barges with thousands of sun-bronzed men and women using them—men and women obviously well nourished and happy.

Though still far inferior to the average Western Europe, the standard of dressing among women is noticeably improving each year. But in the provinces waved hair, lipsticks and painted finger nails are rare. More attention is given to dress styles as portrayed in the new fashion magazines. Choice fabrics continue scarce, but many girls manage to make themselves attractive in gaily-colored ginghams. Men, too, are showing an increasing consciousness about their clothes. Creased trousers and shined shoes are less rare than on my last trip

In a hotel at Stalingrad I saw the doorman bar a worker from the dining room where a jazz band played and the diners danced in their shirt-sleeves. The worker had committed the social error of coming dressed in a bathing suit. He loudly protested against this restriction of his freedom.

In the principal cities the Intourist agency has built excellent modern hotels. Most of the rooms have baths. I stayed in a new 10-story Moscow hotel where every room had a bath, free telephone and radio equipment, full-length mirrors, divans and writing desks with stationery. The hotel now provides soap and toilet paper. The rate was 36 rubles a day or about $7 at the present rate of exchange. That would be expensive for the taxi man who drove me. His salary was 350 rubles a months, and he paid 80 rubles rent for 40 square yards of living space.

In the provinces the people are less wary of contacts with foreigners than in Moscow. Tourists encounter everywhere a friendliness and good-natured curiosity, especially about one's salary and how much one paid for his suit and shoes. A surprisingly large number of young engineers and technicians have a smattering of English, which they learned in their schools and are eager to practice it. Their usual comment it:

"Things are better than they used to be and are getting better all the time."

The Congress That Turned

By TULLY NETTLETON

Christian Science Monitor

When forecasters, last December, began looking ahead to the convening of the Seventy-fifth Congress they ran their fingers down long lists of emergency statutes that would expire during 1937 unless renewed or revised in some way, and opinion that on that score alone it would be a long, warm session.

Then came January 12 and with it President Roosevelt's announcement of the monumental reorganization plan worked out by the Brownlow Committee, contemplating consolidation of 100 agencies of the Government into 12 departments, establishment of two new departments, provision of six executive assistants for the President, extension of the civil service merit system in all directions and replacement of the Comptroller-General with a new post-audit system.

With that bundle on the Capitol doorstep, it appeared clearer than ever that Congress would have a lot of washing to do before its members could consider their job done and go home.

Besides this, there was speculation as to what the President might propound in the nature of a second installment of the New Deal. He was back from the November wars with a new vote of confidence from the nation, and in his final campaign speech he had declared the Administration would continue to seek to improve working conditions for the workers of America and continue its efforts in behalf of the farmers. He was known to be interested also in slum-clearance housing and the reduction of farm tenancy. The situation presented in a still unbalanced budget was such as to call for serious study.

But no one at that time could possibly have told—unless it was the President himself, and he apparently did not foresee such a struggle—what, in fact, would turn out to be the major issue of the session, overshadowing nearly six months of its deliberations and rising to the importance of an apparent turning point in the course of the Administration.

This was, as, of course, everyone now well knows, the Judicial Reform of Supreme Court plan which Mr. Roosevelt, to the astonishment of practically everyone, suddenly threw into the hopper on Feb. 5. Senator Henry F. Ashurst, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, last fall had chided the Republicans for such a preposterous intimation as that President Roosevelt would attempt to pack the Supreme Court. A White House secretary, only two weeks before the fateful message, had taken pains to scotch reports that the President or the Department of Justice was considering some kind of curb on the Supreme Court, which had thrown out the NRA and AAA.

Yet here it was, a demand not for two-thirds decisions in voiding acts of Congress, nor for a constitutional amendment to confer broader powers, nor for opportunity to appoint merely one or two new judges, but for a provision by which he might add at a stroke six new judges to the long-settled bench of nine.

The issue thus precipitated took on the nature of a crusade. There was ardor and outraged zeal on both sides. The strongest New Dealers averred this was the key wedge of their whole program; the court must be "unpacked" of its alleged conservative bias in order that federal power might be adequately used in the furtherance of the "more abundant life." Opponents of the project were sure now that the President meant to overthrow free government, subvert that Constitution and make the judicial branch his puppets.

The effect of the proposal was to make America realize suddenly how revered an institution is the United States Supreme Court, how strong is the tradition of its independence from the legislative or executive arm of the Government and how necessary is an umpire or interpreter of the Constitution if government is to continue to be based on that document.

Many who had supported the New Deal in the preceding election found themselves unable to think with the President on this. Some who tried to defend that proposal could do so only half-heartedly. Newspapers that had fought against odds in his behalf could go along no farther and believed he had been badly advised.

More significant for the congressional effect, certain senators of distinctly liberal record rose in determined opposition—Burton K. Wheeler, running mate of La Follette in 1924; Edward R. Burke, whose definition of the New Deal Mr. Roosevelt had accepted in 1934; Pat McCarran, an inveterate sponsor of labor bills, and Joseph C. O'Mahoney, hitherto an Administration wheelhorse.

It was natural that conservative Democratic senators, such as Carter Glass, Harry F. Byrd, Josiah W. Bailey, William H. King and Royal S. Copeland, some already critical of the Administration, should be aligned against such a radical proposal. And still more natural for the remaining handful of Republicans, who, under the leadership of Senator Charles L. McNary, believed politic to keep very quiet and leave the active resistance to the disaffected Democrats.

So herein came about early and explosively the schismatic division which the more cynical observers had presaged for the unprecedented and unwieldy majorities which the Democratic landslide of 1936 returned to the House of Representatives and especially to the Senate.

The division is partly along lines of sentiment and partly along lines of geography. It has long been known that the Democratic Party in the South is much more conservative and has many more conservative leaders than the northern branch of the party. This regionalism cropped out again in the vote of many southern senators against the wage and hour regulation bill.

This, coupled with President Roosevelt's continuing affection for such progressive elements as those represented by Senator Robert M. La Follette and Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia, keeps alive and even freshens the perennial speculations as to whether a realignment of political parties may come out of the Roosevelt Administration. Sheer logic would prescribe a coalition of conservative or constitutional democrats with the remnant of the Republican Party and a picking up of left wing support by the New Deal Democratic organization to make an all-round liberal party.

But politics is seldom so logical. Unquestionably there will be some changes. There will be drifts of individuals and small groups the way Secretary Henry Wallace quit a Republican tradition to become a New Dealer. But the two parties have shown a great capacity for absorbing impacts within themselves—between liberal and conservative Democrats, and insurgent and standpat Republicans—without shattering.

These conflicts can, however, play havoc with legislation. The long battle over the court plan, ending finally in defeat and recommital of the President's proposals, kept the legislative mill at a standstill or grinding chicken feed during all the period in which a session of Congress normally does its work. And by that time the urge to get home and take off their shoes was too strong on the part of many congressmen to allow anyone to keep them around long enough to enact much of a program of social betterment.

The many extensions or renewals of emergency acts which had promised a full calendar and some important debates at the outset were either voted or forgotten and, with a few exceptions, nobody noticed much which. Included were some subjects of consequence such as extension of authority for reciprocal trade agreements, continuance of the international currency stabilization fund, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Civilian Conservation Corps and a list of excise or "nuisance" taxes.

The new Neutrality Act constituted an important piece of legislation, and after the court fight had gone nearly far enough President Roosevelt tossed in another subject good for two or three sessions in its own right—namely, minimum labor standards or regulation of wages and hours. The Railroad Pensions Act, the Farm Tenancy Act, the Guffey-Vinson Coal Act and the $1,500,000,000 relief appropriation rank of course as measures of significance in their fields.

But after the Administration had met its match in public and congressional opposition to tampering with the Supreme Court, it was a very much shortened calendar that party leaders insisted upon, and now not as a "must" list, but as a "desired" list, of legislation to be enacted before adjournment.

Judicial reorganization shrank to a shadow of its former self. The administrative reorganization, which had loomed so toweringly large, withered practically to giving the President his six "selfless" assistants. The farm program, especially crop control, was largely jettisoned for the time being. The wage and hour legislation continued a "must." The Wagner housing bill was given every opening. And some kind of a sugar quota agreement seemed imperative. But all this is pretty small by comparison with the big things that were expected of the 1937 Congress.

From the point of view of the started out, this may readily be characterized as the Congress that got sidetracked—sidetracked by an uncommonly controversial special message from the President. From another point of view, that of asserting prerogatives which had largely lain dormant or been surrendered to the executive branch since 1933, this may surely be considered the Congress that found itself.

The "rubber stamp" proclivities of the Seventy-fourth Congress might have been expected to continue in a body that contained even larger majorities of the Administration's party. But a cartoonist has depicted such a rubber stamp suddenly coming to life and implanting a "K. O" instead of an "O. K." on the court bill.

One wonders how much the President's prestige has suffered in the long run from this denouement. Some have suggested a parallel to the disastrous efforts of Woodrow Wilson to obtain ratification for the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations. But Mr. Roosevelt's term has yet three years to run, where Wilson's had but one. And subsequent votes indicate that the not altogether hardened but that the lines formed on the court issue have President still has the allegiance in general of a number who disagreed with him that once.

Will his prestige in the sesond session of the present Congress be sufficient to enable him to put through at least a satisfying minimum of his social program or will he be balked until he feels called upon at length to go before the people for what he would hope would be another mandate in the form of a third term? Many of his best friends dread that possibility.

Fortunately, the later attitude of the current session tends not to bear out wholly the charge of extreme New Dealers that opposition to the court plan was merely covert resistance to all social improvement. While some opposition doubtless was of the hard-shelled variety, there is yet enough of an independent fringe that specific liberal legislation, such as labor standards, housing and the like, can be considered on its merits.

At any rate, the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress will be remembered as the one that insisted on sticking to the rules of the game and resolved there should be no short-circuiting of the Constitution by packing or even repacking the Supreme Court.

Internationalism

With one current picture being filmed with foreign-born players in the three top roles at Columbia Studios, and two pictures on other studio lots having two foreign-born leads apiece, Hollywood is having a sudden spurt of internationalism.

Columbia's new romantic comedy, "It's All Yours," directed by Elliott Nugent, has Madeleine Carroll as leading lady. She was born in West Bromwich, England, daughter of an Irish father and a French mother. Francis Lederer, leading man, was born in Prague, Czechoslovakia. Miscles Auer, who plays a French baron, is a native of St. Petersburgh, Russia.

At Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Greta Garbo, native of Stockholm, is starred opposite Charles Boyer in "Madame Walewska." Boyer was born in Versailles, France. "It's Love I'm After," being made on the First National lot, features Erroll Flynn, from Belfast, Ireland, and Olivia De Havilland born in Tokyo, Japan.

Dolly Haas, Berlin-born musical comedy star, recently signed under long-term contract, is rehearsing for a Columbia musical as yet untitled. Dolores Del Rio, native of Durango, Mexico, and Luli Deste from Vienna, Austria, will soon start Columbia pictures.

Cocco Company Makes International Film

The Cocco Film Company, the importers of "Der Student von Prag," now at the Hibiya Eiga Gekijo and sole distributors of German Tobis films in the Orient, is going to make an international film entitled "Typhoon" jointly with Mr. Richard Angst, cameraman of the New Earth, and Richard Schweitzer, German scenario writer.

The Cocco Film Company was founded last August with Mr. Takeo Ogasawara as president.

Joint Board Starts Task Of Salmon Conservation

Christian Science Monitor

SEATTLE, Wash. — Appointment by President Roosevelt of three Americans to serve on the six-man International Salmon Fisheries Commission for Canada and the United States sets in motion the machinery for conservation of one of the great food resources of the nation, that of the sockeye salmon. This conservation project marks a 30-year effort to save this fishery.

The American appointees are Charles Jackson of South Carolina, Assistant United States Commissioner of Fisheries; Edward W. Allen, who has served on the International Halibut Commission, and B. M. Brennan, director of the Washington State Department of Fisheries. The Canadian members of the commission are Dr. William A. Found, deputy minister of fisheries of Canada; Thomas Reid, M. P. from New Westminster, familiar with Fraser River fisheries, and H. L. Hager, president of the Canadian Fishing Company.

Exploitation Common

The sockeye or red salmon has its source in the Fraser River of British Columbia but must pass through the American waters of Puget Sound to reach its spawning grounds. For years it has been subject to exploitation by nationals of both countries with a consequent steady depletion in value.

As early as 1908, Miller Freeman, publisher of the Pacific Fisherman, called the attention of Theodore Roosevelt to the threatened destruction of the run and the matter was taken up with Great Britain at that time But this and subsequent efforts to form a conservation treaty with Canada were always blocked by fishing interests until in recent years the opposition was withdrawn and a treaty, revised and re-ratified, has at last become operative.

Mr. Freeman expresses the view that if the newly created salmon commission will follow the procedure that has proved so successful in administering the Pacific Halibut Treaty the salmon fisheries of the Fraser River system will be restored to something comparable with their one-time magnitude. He considers this to be the finest opportunity to carry through a sound constructive conservation program.

Halibut Treaty a Guide

In the administration of the Halibut Treaty, years of fact-finding about the halibut have been followed by regulation of the industry. The results have been unmistakable, and an industry which was nearly destroyed is today restored to one of the world's great fisheries. It is the example of this conservation experiment which has overcome all opposition to a salmon commission.

Under terms of the salmon treaty there will be a preliminary study of two cycles of the sockeye before regulatory powers are given the commission. As the salmon is a four-year fish this means that eight years must elapse before much needed regulation can be undertaken. This provision was much debated and went in as compromise measure Under terms of the revised treaty all species in treaty waters may be studied.

Both in Canada and on this side of the border, people are saying, "the big things is to keep the salmon commission out of factionalism and politic."

This warning is actuated by what is seen at this time as an effort being made at Prince Rupert, where the halibut industry centers, to change the ruling of the Halibut Commission for what is seen as a local benefit. Opposition to such a step is voiced by the Daily Province of Vancouver, which says editorially after describing the excellent work of the commission in saving the halibut fishery from extinction:

"Into this very excellent setup, backed by loyal cooperation from United States and Canadian fishermen and processing companies, the interfering finger of British Columbia's parish politics is now beginning to make itself felt. Unless this interference is speedily removed, soon we may have no international agreement at all and the good work of rehabilitation of this industry may be wiped out once more."

Ever since the Halibut Commission was created by joint treaty in 1924, Canadians and Americans have worked in accord in both the laboratory and on the commission. Research under the direction of Dr. W. F. Thompson of the University of Washington was followed by regulation of the industry. Under regulation, the poundage per unit of gear in and around Prince Rupert has increased from 300 pounds when the commission began to 60 pounds, and more, at the present time.

Lumbermen Hold Trade Pact With Canada Is Unfair

Christian Science Monitor

SEATTLE, Washington — Alleged discrimination against lumber—the basic industry of the Pacific Northwest—resulting from the present reciprocal trade agreement with Canada is, after a year and a half of operation, increasingly deplored by lumbermen.

The agreement made by the United States opened up the domestic lumber market to Canada, its greatest rival in the lumber market, but failed to balance this concession with any beneficial export agreement, the lumbermen say. The Pacific Northwest is primarily an export region. Its export lumber trade, however, has been greatly depleted through preferential tariffs extended to Canadian lumber in British ports.

In a summary of the situation made by the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, concurring with an exposition of these facts made recently by Senator Charles L. McNary of Oregon, it is stated:

"The people of this region had every right to expect that the new reciprocity would work both ways; that in yielding Candian lumber a United States market we would secure an equivalent share of the British Empire market for North Pacific lumber. But the Canadian agreement contained no such concessions. The United States lumber market has been conceded to the principal competitor of the Washington-Oregon lumber industry, and nothing has been given in return. Canada eats her cake and has it, too."

In spite of an improved domestic market, it is reported, the North Pacific lumber has failed to overcome export losses. A report of the Timber Conservation Board made to the Department of Commerce, while it reports that United States lumber has gradually worked its way to a more satisfactory basic condition in the domestic market, also reports that exports from the West Coast are "most decisively handicapped by foreign discriminations" and maintains it is a "stringent and pressing" problem. The fact that the United States has dropped from first to fifth place in the world's interchange of lumber is attributed here largely to export losses in the Pacific Northwest, due to the so-called discriminatory tariffs.

The economic future of the Pacific Northwest, Senator McNary points out, is rooted in utilization of land fit only for the production of forest crops. A vast program is under way through federal and state agencies for timber cropping that insures continuous land use and permanent forest industry. Abandoned farm lands and submarginal lands in other parts of the country are fit only for forest cultivation. This forest land, he concludes, will maintain a forest industry only so long as it is needed in a healthy lumber market.

Australia Finds Veteran Pension Cost On Increase

Christian Science Monitor

CANBERRA, Australia—More than a quarter of the returned soldiers who obtained homes 18 years ago by the Federal War Service homes act own their properties. Some 37,136 took advantage of the act, and moved into houses provided by the Government. Of that number 9586 have discharged all liabilities.

Since the act was passed, the War Service Homes Commission has spent £29,341,975 in the purchase of land, and construction and acquisition of homes.

Financial assistance for returned soldiers and dependents has become one of the Federal Government's most important works. Its place in annual budgeting can be appreciated when it is remembered that payments for war and repatriation service represent about one quarter of the Commonwealth's total revenue.

Ramifications of war service pensions are enormous and are growing each year. On June 30 of this year, 251,806 war pensions were being paid by the Government, but of this total only 77,076 were soldiers. Last year the war pensions bill was nearly £8,000,000, and the total amount paid between June, 1916, and June, 1937, was £139,794,321.

Cuts in pension rates made during the depression years have been almost completely restored, and the Government is faced with an annually rising cost. Liberalization of the original pension legislation also has increased the number of those being assisted. For instance, it has been realized that the strain of war service has not told on many men for years after their discharges. There was no provision for helping them under the original act, but now they receive what are known as "service pensions." Moreover, the State also help widows and children of these men. There are 4708 soldiers, 1475 wives, 1976 children, and 330 widows and orphans, receiving service pensions, the annual liability being £263,000.

U.S. Cotton Crop

ties by cotton hoppers.

The census bureau announced 1,871,403 running bales of cotton of this year's growth, counting round bales as half bales, had been ginned to Sept. 1, compared with 1,374,247 a year ago, and 1,135,090 two years ago.

A month ago the department reported an indicated crop of 15,593,000 bales, based on Aug. 1 conditions. Production last year was 12,398,832 bales.

Large Abandonment

Last month's estimate was based on 33,428,000 acres—the area in cultivation July 1 less the 10-year average abandonment. Today's estimate was based on the area left for harvest after abandonment since July 1. Abandonment was placed at 1.3 per cent since that date, compared with the 10-year average abandonment of 2.3 per cent. The area left for harvest is 33,736,000 acres, compared with 30,028,000 acres picked last year and 27,640,000 in 1925.

The condition of the crop Sept 1, another factor in the increased production, was 75.0 per cent of a normal, compared with 81.3 a month ago—the highest condition reported since August, 1911—59 per cent on Sept. 1, last year, and 58, the 1923-32 Sept. 1 average.

Indications are for a yield of 228.5 pounds of lint cotton to the acre, compared with 197.6 pounds last year, and 69.9 pounds, the 1923-32 average.

NEW YORK, Sept. 8—Cotton lost 21 to 24 points today following publication of the government crop indication for 16,098,000 bales, but after prices had sold down to or slightly below the recent lows there was enough resistance, a little above the 9-cent level, to cause partial recoveries.

December, which had eased from 9.29 to 9.02, was selling at 9.06 in mid-afternoon, when the market was about 13 to 20 points net lower.

The influence of the larger crop figures was partly offset by unfavorable weather in the eastern belt and southern Mississippi valley, which has prevailed since Sept. 1, the date for which the crop figures were compiled.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Horrible Punishment

Lane Running was the most barbaric punishment provided in the old Prussian military code. The culprit would be driven slowly through a lane of 200 soldiers, each of whom held a stout birch rod in his hand. As the soldier advanced under the watchful eye of a non-commissioned officer, each of his comrades had to deal him a smashing blow on his bared back. Any soldier detailed to this execution risked to have lane running inflicted upon himself, if his hand should lag out of pity. A single trip down the lane was usually fatal. But there is one case on record in which a doomed soldier made the trip 30 times and survived. This soldier was Eils Hannuten of the Berlin garrison, who was sentenced to 6,000 lashes for the crime of attempting suicide, in 1804. Hannuten fainted 29 times and was revived each time so that his punishment could continue. At his trial he pleaded that the barbarously harsh treatment he received from his superiors had caused him to seek escape in death.

Postmaster in 19 Different Jails

James J. Walsh of Cork, first Postmaster of the Irish Free State, was the founder of the first Irish Rifle Club, the members of which were the first Irish Nationalists in centuries to appear armed in public. As an arden advocate of Sinn Fein, he took part in the Easter Rising, and was repeatedly sentenced to death and deportation. He escaped repeatedly and was just as frequently recaptured.

He was elected Senior Deputy for Cork in the Irish election of 1918 by the largest number of votes in all Ireland. When the Irish Parliament met, it was discovered that there was hardly anyone among them who had not served in one or more jails for Irish freedom. But the record was held by Walsh, who had served time in 19 different prisons.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY CELEBRATIONS

It was decided at the Annual General meeting of the St. Andrew Society of Yokohama and Tokyo that, providing sufficient support is forthcoming, the celebrations on St. Andrew's Day would be in the form of a dance. In view of the unsettled conditions ruling at present, the majority of the members at the meeting were in favor of a dance of an informal nature to be held at the Yokohama Country and Athletic Club.

It is estimated that the Y.C.A.C. can not accommodate more than 250 to 300 people for such a function and it has been decided to limit the number of guests per subscriber to twelve (including family). An orchestra, Haggis, sandwiches, coffee, and the cream will be provided. Other refreshments will be served as usual. The function will last from 10 p.m. till 2 a.m.

Reel practices will commence November 2. The Y.C. and A.C. has extended the previlege to non-members of the Club of signing chits on practice nights, provided they add to their signature, "St. Andrew Society."

He performed "Japanese Ballet," a new creation in his New York recitals.

French Moving

of social order.

Nocturnal Illumination

It is sincerely hoped that this is the case, and on all hands the cry is being raised that such a remarkable collection of interesting objects should be "reprieved." Parisians in particular do not want to be deprived of the fairy spectacle of nocturnal illuminations that is presented on the Seine. Floodlighting, colored fountains, searchlights, pillars of fire like the Tour Eiffel, are extremely effective.

The masterpieces of French painting both retrospective and contemporary, are here brought together; and should not lightly be dispersed after a few brief months, it is felt. The French theater is at its best for the occasion. French poetry is declaimed into space. French music fills the sky. The quintessence of French civilization, of French culture, is to be found at the exhibition.

But while it is natural that France should be foremost, nearly all other countries are showing their peculiar qualities, and the comparison is highly interesting. So much ingenuity, so much skill, so much labor must be given an adequate opportunity. And an adequate opportunity means the reopening of the exhibition next year.

The Palais de la Decouverte, it is felt, ought to have a more permanent form. It reveals the marvels of electricity; it brings the wonders of astronomy before the public; it provides entertaining lessons in physics and in chemistry. There is no branch of natural science which is not here represented with a wealth of illustration.

Triumph of Mankind

How mankind has progressively triumphed over the forces which he thought were ranged against him, but which have become his auxiliaries, his servants, is here manifest. The inventions which are landmarks in the history of humanity are shown. One cannot but have a new idea of the genius, together with the indefatigable patience, of innumerable and anonymous investigators, who have brought into our everyday life methods and instruments which we are likely to take for granted.

The wheel, the making of fire, the rudder, the compass, steam, electricity, oil, the microscope, the telescope, the cinema, the radio, the train, the automobile, the airplane—there are only a few of the commonplaces of today which are truly astonishing when we consider that they had to be found and evolved by men who once knew nothing, and could scarcely guess anything, of their existence, of their possibility. If for the Palais de la Decouverte alone, the exhibition must be prolonged.

So now that the "principle" of the extension is admitted, the authorities are hard at work to make the practical arrangements.

H.G. Wells Wants

many years, he said, he had been interested in public thought. As a result of its present training, he added, public thought, in his opinion, is "uninstructed, feeble and convulsive."

"What are we telling young people directly about the world in which they are to live?" Mr. Wells asked. "What is the world picture we are presenting to their minds?

"We have no time to waste if our schools are not to go on delivering, year by year, fresh hordes of ignorant, unbalanced, uncritical minds," he added.

The first step in his own plan is, Mr. Wells declared, to begin by telling true stories of the past and other lands, by making the weather and the mud-pie an introduction to elementary physiography, by turning the tiger, the wolf and the bear from "nightmare material" into sympathetic creatures.

He went on to outline a course of history telling of the early Semitic, Persian, Roman and similar civilizations.

"When at last we focus our attention on the British Isles and France," he said, "we shall have the affairs of these regions in a proper proportion to the rest of the human adventure."

Mr. Wells spoke of geography along the same lines. "We do not want our budding citizens to chant lists of capes and rivers, but we do want them to have a real picture in their minds," he said, "of the Amazon forests, the pampas, the various phases in the course of the Nile.

"We have enormous resources now in cheap photography, in films and so forth, that even our fathers never dreamt of—to make all this vivid and real."

Study of New Theories

Mr. Wells continued by stating that the modern citizen must be made to understand the increasing importance of economic changes in history and be given some grasp of leading theories of socialism, individualism, and the corporate state.

"For the next five-and-twenty years now the ordinary man all over the earth will be continually confronted with these systems of ideas," he added, "but we send out our young people absolutely unprepared for the heated and biased interpretations they will encounter. We hush it up until they are in the thick of it."

Continuing, Mr. Wells said that the new citizens must also be given an account of the social structure, of trade, of production and invention, and of the conventions of property and money.

Next, Mr. Wells suggested, the main philosophies must be explained to the adolescent, as impartially as possible.

"It may all seem impossibly bold and 'Utopian,'" he concluded, "but we are living in a world in which a battleship costs £8,000,000, and in which we can raise an extra 400 million for armaments with only a slight stock exchange qualm, and which has seen the Zeppelin, the radio, the bombing airplane come absolutely out of nothing since 1900. And our schools are "drooling along very much as they were drooling along 37 years ago."

Riddle Of Central

garo-Yugoslav agreement had already pointed in the same direction.

The frequent comings and goings of Polish and Rumanian statesmen between Warsaw and Bucharest strengthened the supposition that Czechoslovakia was being progressively isolated in preparation for some attempt to give practical and perhaps drastic form to the violent campaign of the German National Socialist press against the "Bolshevists" of Prague. In short, "Central Europe" looked like going into the melting pot.

One uncertainty, nevertheless, remained. What was the precise nature of the relations between the Czechoslovak Republic and Soviet Russia? If Czechoslovakia were attacked, could or would Russia's Army come to her help? The many stories of "Russian airdromes" on Czechoslovak territory were proved to be baseless, and the argument that Soviet troops would be able to pass into Czechoslovakia, through a narrow and lengthy corridor in the north of Rumania, was seen to be strategically fantastic. Still, there was and is the Russo-Czechoslovak non-aggression pact, with its provision for mutual defense in case of need. What did this amount to?

Nobody outside Czechoslovakia and Russia seemed to know. The real question lay in Russia. The Czechoslovaks would certainly defend themselves if they were attacked. But could they stand alone, and would Russia really be able or willing to help them? The most remarkable things about this uncertain position were the calm of the Czechoslovak Government and the steady optimism of President Benes. Perhaps he relied upon the consideration that if the countries of the Little Entente do not hang together they will hang separately, and that their piecemeal absorption into "Middle Europe" would expose Russia and, eventually, France and Great Britain, to serious danger.

But, again, what of Soviet Russia? What is the true meaning of the trials and executions in August, 1936; January, 1937, and—of no fewer than eight prominent generals—in June, 1937? Is the Soviet Union itself involved in a "moral crisis," as Mussolini has declared it to be, or is there real justification for the charges of treason brought against the executed men? Upon the answer to this question much may depend.

My own information, from sources entirely out of sympathy with Soviet Russia, leads me to believe that the charges were not baseless, and that there is more behind the anti-Communist Treaty between Germany and Japan than has been generally supposed. There was consternation in certain military circles at Berlin when the news came that the eight Russian generals had been executed. Japan was already beginning to doubt the wisdom of being drawn into a complicated scheme of policy of which the main object, in German eyes, was to insure the disappearance of "Central Europe" and the triumph of "Middle Europe;" for Japan can never be sure whether she could get the compensation in the Far East which this policy assigns to her without producing dangerous reactions in London and at Washington. If the drastic "purge" carried through in Russia should mean the postponement of this policy, I imagine that relief in Japan will have been nearly as sincere as it would undoubtedly be at Prague and in other capitals of "Central Europe."

What the position in Central Europe may be a year hence no man can yet say. But the confidence which continues to prevail at Prague leads me to think that the most acute phase of danger to European freedom may have passed. If, so, there will be time for the men in control of British policy to consider whether the best way to preserve the freedom of Europe would not be for Great Britain to let it be known that her face is resolutely set against warlike adventures of every kind in any quarter.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

From Foundling To Dictator

On a cold winter morning in 1820, with the temperature 40 below zero, a rich German merchant of Ostrov, Russia, found an abandoned baby on his stairway. The childless merchant adopted the baby, named it Theodore Treppauf (Godgiven Upstairs).

The foundling, who was given a good education, eventually became General Feodor Trepoff, adjutant of the Czar, Governor-General of St. Petersburg, head of the Russian police, and the most powerful man in all Russia. Of his two sons, one was Dictator of Russia and the other was Premier.

Fish's Mind Found Similar To Man's

By WILLIAM L. LAURENCE

N. Y. Times

NOTTINGHAM, England, Sept. 4.—Evidence that fish have a mentality similar in every important category to that of man was presented today by Professor James Gray, eminent Cambridge University zoologist, before the annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

A number of experiments performed to test the mental powers of fish, as well as discoveries made within the last few years on the remarkable migrations of eels thousands of miles across the Atlantic and back and the even more remarkable migrations of salmon from fresh water rivers to the sea and back again, force the conclusion that fish in these instances are performing tasks evolving into powers strongly resembling those of man, though of course on a much lower level of intelligence, he declared.

Activities in 4 Categories

Experiments and observations reveal, he added, that the activities of fish fall into four categories: first, rigid reflexes similar to the automatic acts of a man blinking his eyelids; second, powers of forming associations between events; third, the power to carry out highly complicated migratory excursions involving, as far as one can see, the power of memory, and fourth, the power to display emotion.

"As far as I can form a judgment" Professor Gray stated, "these four types of behavior include most, if not all, of the activities of the human race. Almost certainly the associative powers of fish are on a much lower level than those of man, but the power is there and I do not believe we can put our finger on any one of our mental powers and say, 'Herein are we a race apart, elevated above the rest of the animal world.'"

"Neither the body nor the mind of man has come spontaneously into existence. They are the product of a slow but natural evolution. Man's power to circumnavigate the world and his power to circulate blood through the arteries of his body have been inherited from the lower vertebrates, modified and elaborated, no doubt, but nevertheless heirlooms from the past.

"The processes of bodily evolution are slow, and, if we may judge by his ability to live at peace with his neighbors, the evolution of man's mind is even slower."

Man's Most Distinctive Features

Perhaps the most distinctive features of the human being as an individual, Professor Gray said, are his memory and the way in which the normal associations and reflexes in man's brain may be modified by emotional states.

"I shall ask you to consider," he added, "how various fishes respond to a variety of simple changes in their environment and how far their behavior can be modified by education—and then invite you to answer the question for yourselves—viz., 'How far can you form a clear picture of these types of behavior without involving the idea that something akin to memory and emotion and therefore to thought goes on in their brains?'"

The possibility of educating a fish in the sense of inducing it to make mental associations, Professor Gray said, has been realized for many centuries, "for we have authentic accounts of carp coming to be fed by monks when a bell was rung near ponds."

This has been corroborated within recent years by rigid scientific investigations, he added.

Procedure in Experiments

The general procedure in such experiments, he explained, is always the same. Individual fish are kept in carefully secluded conditions and are always fed in exactly the same way, that is, by putting food on a platform some distance from the fish.

At the beginning of the experiment the fish is subjected at certain times to a particular stimulus—such as the ringing of a bell—to which it makes no obvious response at all.

After a time the bell is rung at fixed intervals, say of five seconds, before the food is presented to the fish. After a number of such tests the fish begins to move out toward the food platform immediately the bell is rung.

"A large number of experiments of this type," Professor Gray stated, "show conclusively that the fish has learned to associate the ringing of the bell with the arrival of food—just as we do ourselves.

"By experiments of this type we known that a fish is sensitive to a great variety of very gentle stimuli—that is to say, very slight changes of the temperature, shape and to some slight extent of the color of objects in its vicinity.

"Perhaps the most striking of these experiments is the example of the pike and the minnow. The pike and the minnow were placed in one tank. The pike saw the minnow, darted at it and ate it. The tank was then divided by a clear glass partition and another minnow was placed on the far side of the partition. The pike dashed at the minnow and bumped its head against the glass.

Pike Gives Up Dashing

"After many such experiences the pike associated the sight of the minnow with a painful experience—and he gave up dashing at the minnow. The glass partition was removed and still the pike did not go for the minnow. The pike was 'conditioned' against minnows by his painful experience.

"There is no possible doubt that a fish can educate itself in this way, forming associations and ideas in exactly the same way as a human being. Now you can see that associations of this type involve a concept which is suspiciously similar to memory—and memory recalls the idea of consciousness.

"Furthermore, the fear of pain and unpleasant sensations and educating itself to avoid them show a faculty strongly resembling emotional responses under similar circumstances among humans."

Professor Gray here turned to the migrations of an eel born off the coast of Florida, which begins a three-year 3,000-mile journey as soon as it is hatched to the rivers of Europe and then returns to its birthplace in Florida to breed.

"If we examine a collection of eel larvae from the coast of Florida," he said, "we find it composed of two groups—one belonging to the European eels, the other to the American eels. The European larvae turn eastward, the American larvae turn westward and apparently they never make a mistake.

"How are we to account for this extraordinary feat of navigation? At present we have no convincing explanation of the fact—and we must pause before concluding that in the realm of navigation man takes a higher place than the eel."

Navigation by Salmon

Still more remarkable feats of navigation are performed by salmon that find their way from the Pacific Ocean to the Fraser River in Canada, thence to the Cultus River and from there to a lake and its feeding streams, he added. By building a dam across the Cultus, trapping the salmon on their way to the sea and marking them, it becomes possible to identify them later on their way back to the river.

The results of these recent experiments are striking, Professor Gray said. In the first place, no unmarked adult salmon has been taken in the traps on the Cultus River. Secondly, despite substantial rewards offered for marked fish captured in the other tributary rivers, no authentic stragglers ever have been found.

"These results," Professor Gray declared, "forced us to conclude that the Pacific salmon was able to retrace his path many hundreds of miles and reach, with what can only be called uncanny instincts, the river of its childhood.

"How can we explain these feats of navigation? Has the salmon a sense of direction or does he keep near the bottom, closely recording landmarks as he goes—and so is able to retrace his steps?

"Were we to have carried out comparable experiments on a race of human beings and got similar results, we would have said, 'They do it as you or I would do it, consciously noting landmarks, memorizing them and so retracing their steps'—in fact, they are performing a conscious, premediated, thoughtful and purposive act.

"Are we to apply the same conclusions to fish? If not, why not?"

'Unrestricted' Use Of Planes Is Scored By Hu

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 29—Alleging that the Japanese are using airplanes "unrestrictedly" in the current hostilities against China, Dr. Hu Shih, Nanking's propaganda envoy to the United States, in a speech here today predicted that ultimately the Japanese use of airplanes might force America, Britain, Soviet Russia and other Powers into another world war, although he had not expected America to become involved in the Sino-Japanese dispute

He recalled that mere neutrality was of no avail to keep the United States out of war in 1917. He compared Japan's alleged "unrestricted" use of aircraft to Germany's unrestricted use of submarines during the World War.

Chemical Trade In Europe Makes Rapid Progress

Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK.—It is evident that in Europe there is a growing reliance on chemical science to develop industry and to accelerate rearmament, according to Dr. Harrison E. Howe, editor of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, who has just returned from a trip to England and the Continent, where he participated in a meeting of the directors of Rotary International at Nice.

"The apparent determination on the part of most European countries to become self-sufficient may be somewhat responsible for the extent to which chemistry, both pure and applied, is being supported by leaders in government and industry, but, whatever the underlying reason, the activity is revealing," Dr. Howe says.

Synthetic Production

Germany, Dr. Howe found, is making notable advances in the production of synthetic products from domestic raw materials. Czechoslovakia, with the aid of Belgian capital, is making unusual efforts to expand its chemical industry. Labor unrest has interferred with normal industrial progress in France, while in Great Britain "orderly chemical development" is being speeded by the armament program, according to Dr. Howe

"The program to make Germany well nigh independent of imported products seems to depend to a large degree upon the ability to make what is needed from water, air, limestone, coal, and casein. Some of the products produced are already well known in industry. Others displayed for the first time at the exposition possess great merit, and show the result of applying great ingenuity.

"One is a new insulating material made by the polymerization of foam from a synthetic resin. Another is the Zell Wolle or wool substitute made from wood cellulose. A third is the synthetic petroleum, first made by the Fischer process as well, and a fourth is the Buna rubber produced now on a large scale.

"The great extent of some of the chemical works is well known, but it is nevertheless impressive to realize that in one of the plants a thousand tons per day of synthetic petroleum is being produced, in addition to vast quantities of other products made largely by high-pressure synthesis.

Enterprising Czechoslovakia

"On one border of Germany we find Czechoslovakia, enterprising and active, and with a great chemical works at Aussig, recently modernized, it is understood, with the help of Belgian capital. The cost of raw materials may considerably restrict competition of Czechoslovakian chemical plants for some time, but it is a development with which we should keep in touch.

"On another border lies France, greatly disturbed economically, if not politically, and with industries left uncertain because of the present attitude of labor, the disputes over hours and wages, and the strikes of all kinds which, as we know here in America, interfere decidedly with normal industrial trends.

"In Great Britain, the home of one of the three greatest chemical organizations of the world, things chemical proceed in orderly fashion, business is better, and the armament program in progress has its influence upon chemical as well as upon other industrial activity.

"One returns realizing that there is much to be learned on the other side of the ocean."

LEAVE JAPAN

Mr. Eric Lewis of Shanghai who has been in Japan for the past two weeks sailed today to return to Shanghai, Mrs. Lewis is sailing with him as far as Nagasaki and will then return to Tokyo, where she and her daughter, Marjorie, plan to stay for some time. Marjorie is at present a student in the International School in Yokohama.

MOVES TO NONOMIYA

Mr. T. W. Eckersley who has been staying for the past month at the Y.M.C.A. moved Sunday to the Nonomiya Apartments where he has Room 204.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN

A general meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan will be held at the German Club, No. 7 Hirakawa-cho 2-chome, Kojimachi-ku, Wednesday, October 13, at 4:30 p.m., when Mr. William R. B. Acker, of the Freer Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C., will read a paper on "The Color Palette of the Kano School as given in the Honcho-gashi."

RETURNS TO JAPAN

Mrs. M. L. Gordon, mother of Mrs. C. S. Reifsnider will return to Japan at the end of this month.

RETURNS HOME

Mr. Noel Nouet, who has been confined at the Kokusai Seibo Hospital at Ochiai for the past two weeks returned to his new home, No. 5, 7 banchi, Nichome, Fujimicho, Kojimachi, Sunday.

DR. SHINJO RETURNS TO TOKYO

Dr. Shinzo Shinjo, director of the Institute of Natural Science in Shanghai returned to Tokyo accompanied by Mr. Saburo Kakemi, his assistant Sunday on board the Nagasaki Maru. He will stay here for about two weeks and will go back to his post.

TO GIVE A DANCE RECITAL

Miss Konami, Ishii, noted dancer will give a recital at the Hibiya Public Hall at 7 p.m. October 15. She will perform some newly created solo dances and Mr. Yoshiyuki Fukui, pianist, will assist at the piano.

TO GIVE DANCE RECITAL

Miss Muriel Allan, who has been teaching dancing here since last year will give a recital at 8 p.m. Thursday, October 21 at the Denki Club, Hibiya. Mr. Thomas R. G. Lyell will assist her. Miss Allan, an exponent of the "modern" classical school, has danced in London, New York and on the Italian Riviera. She has studied under Charles Weidman, and in the Mary Wigman and Martha Graham schools in New York and the Isadora Duncal School in London. She is a graduate of Barnard College, Columbia University.

NEW SHIP ON O.S.K. LINE

The newly built O.S.K. Liner S.S. Ohryokumaru, a passenger boat of 7,100 tons gross which is to be put on the Kobe-Dairen Service, will leave Kobe for Dairen on her maiden voyage Tuesday, October 12. The O.S.K., therefore, has 10 ships on her Japan-Manchoukuo Line, and this new boat is one of the largest ships, as the sister ship of S. S. Kokuryu-maru which was built last August.

TO CELEBRATE CENTENARY

In celebration of the centenary of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, a reception was held on board the company's liner Naldera at Yokohama Friday evening. About 400 guests were present, including the British Ambassador and Lady Craigie, the Mayor of Yokohama and Mrs. Shuzo Aoki, the Director of Customs and Mrs. Mitsuteru Motoo, the British Commercial Counsellor and Lady Sansom, the British military attache and Mrs. F. S. G. Piggott, the British Naval Attache and Mrs. H. B. Rawlings, Mr. H. Otani, chairman of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and Mr. Watanabe, Mr. S. Shimizu and Mr. M. Ichiki, managing directors. Owing to illness, the Governor of Kanagawa Prefecture and Mrs. Kiyoshi Nakarai were unable to be present. The guesst were received in the foyer by Captain E. F. Hannan, commander of the Naldera, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Standage, Mr. Standage is a director of the firm of Mackinnon, Mackenzie and Company (Japan,) Limited agents of the P. and O. line. Shaw For Science; Hits At Scientists

By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

N. Y. Times

LONDON, Sept. 4—The British Association for the Advancement of Science is in session at Nottingham. Of course, I regard this as an important event. I shook the economic section to its foundations fifty years ago with a Fabian essay. The meeting of the association acts as an annual reminder that there is such a thing as science. And it is a first-rate picnic for the intelligentsia.

Science is obviously a good thing. Then what is the matter with scientists? Only that they are not scientific enough.

Physiologists think science is a routine of put-up jobs in laboratories. Mathematicians and physicists will believe in nothing but equations and the square root of minus one. And now Sir Arthur Eddington tells us there are sixteen square roots of minus one. Nobody else, they contend, is scientific.

Let us distinguish between an hypothesis and ascertained facts. It is perfectly true that the only way to test an hypothesis is to assume it is true and see how it works. But, as to ascertained facts, I am tempted to say that they do not exist in the scientific world any more than in the political world.

A Skeptic on Science

When I was 16 I believed everything that the scientists said. I was what you may call a scientific fundamentalist. Now that I am five times 16 and have seen scientific facts crashing, one after the other, until even Newton is left with only a pragmatic sanction, all my freethinking skepticism challenges science and leaves the religious legends alone as comparatively harmless.

But what is a scientist? Do we mean (or rather, do they mean) a man who observes physical phenomena and bases theories upon his observations? As a rule, they do not.

I observe phenomena, physical and metaphysical, as they occur in nature, beyond my control, and reason from them as best I can. But my claim to be a man of science is not admitted because I do not manufacture phenomena in a laboratory to suit my theories and produce the results as scientific proofs.

Let it be admitted that, during the past hundred years, a few men of science have added to human knowledge and happiness and therefore to the dignity of man.

But the prevalent school, until quite lately, was a Ku Klux Klan of mechanist scoundrels who claimed that the pursuit of knowledge is exempt from all moral obligations. The mass of suffering and mortality caused by the blunders of these mental defectives is incalculable. The reaction against it is producing a vogue for hysterical quackeries of all sorts.

Gives Praise to Engineer

You might call Marconi a man of science and an engineer. But why call him names? But we owe very much to the engineer. We owe almost all our immunity from the ancient plagues to the sanitary engineer, to sunshine and fresh air and soap and water. And the effect of these, as Sir Almroth Wright pointed out in one of his inspired moments, is purely esthetic. But the Jennerians and Pasteurites take all the credit for it.

I am not suggesting a return to the methods of the Middle Ages. I should say that the medieval scientist worked with one very anxious eye on the inquisition. In the sixth century, he worked with his other eye on the need for abolishing an old Jewish idol who had usurped the place of God and become an incalculable nuisance. And this irrelevant preoccupation certainly did spoil his intellectual integrity very much.

You may say that the pure scientist has a passion for facts, whatever, on the face of it, may seem their unimportance to man, and conclude that he is right because you never can tell what will be of importance.

But we all have a passion for facts, and are, to that extent, pure scientists. You see, we all need more power over our circumstances and we can attain that—mere accidental discoveries apart—only by more knowledge.

Holds Purpose Pragmatic

It is this that constitutes that purpose and evolutionary appetite that the mechanist idiots so furiously deny.

Of course, you cannot expect science to devote itself first and foremost to a study of the means to make domestic life more spacious and inspiring. Can you seriously suggest that Einstein should have devoted himself to perfecting the vacuum cleaner instead of finding out what was wrong with the perihelion of Mercury? It has been suggested that the man of science is often a confounded nuisance when he stays off his own cabbage patch. But I say no, he is a far more dangerous nuisance when he sticks there.

It is the scientific scullery man who knows nothing of music, painting, literature, history and religion who is to be dreaded. These fellows torment dogs and cut ducts out of guinea pigs for twenty-five years and then announce, as epoch-making discoveries, something that any agricultural laborer could have told them at the beginning.

Italy Is Placing Greater Burdens On Corporations

Christian Science Monitor

ROME.—The part the corporations are actually playing in organizing the economic life of the country has gained immensely in importance in the second quarter of 1937.

To them have now been assigned great responsibilities in regulating prices, wages, the opening of new or enlargement of existing plants, which entails the regulation of investments, and the planning of economic policies with a view to increasing national self-sufficiency.

Recently the corporations have been meeting to consider plans. The mining industries corporation, in conjunction with those for the metal and engineering trades and the chemical industries, is engaged on the problem of further prospecting for coal and ores and on their utilization to the best economic advantage. Among recent developments of importance is the equipping of a fine coaling port at Sant' Antioco in the islands of Sardinia under the auspices of the Italian Coal and Anthracite Corporation, in connection with the working of the coal mines of Bacu Abis and Piari. Near the latter, a new mining center, the Commune of Carbonia, is being built, while a powerful electro-thermal station is being erected to work the metallic ores obtained in the neighborhood

Interest in Magnesite

Special interest is now taken in the utilization of Italy's vast beds of magnesite for the production of metallic magnesium from which special light alloys are being obtained. It is expected that their use will rapidly develop. A special commission is studying possibilities in this direction.

The successful floating by the Industrial Reconstruction Institute of the 900 million bond issue during the first half of July is facilitating the reorganization if the iron and steel industry. In this connection the metal corporation is studying the problem of securing the requisite supplies of scrap, and jointly with the water, electricity, and gas corporation is planning for the further increase of hydroelectric power to reduce coal consumption in the foundries.

The chemical trades are playing an all-important part in national development. The growth of production in this field is shown by a few figures. The output of caustic soda has risen from 80,000 metric tons in 1930 to 135,000 in 1936, that of calcium carbide from 85,000 to 150,000, of bromine from 22 to 130. The series of metallic salts has been completed, and the output of dye stuffs has risen from 6,900 to 10,400 metric tons while imports have fallen from 2100 tons in 1925 to 700 in 1935.

The chemical corporation at its recent meetings considered a four-year plan for the production of synthetic nitrogen to meet present and prospective needs and the development to be given to the existing plants in connection therewith. Details will be definitely passed on at the next meeting.

An inter-guild commission on potash and aluminum has been instructed to report on plans for securing potash and alumina salts from Italy's practically inexhaustible leucite beds, and for promoting the use of aluminum as a substitute for copper.

Plants for Tin Work

Seven months ago work was started to erect the great plants required for developing the tin mines of Monte Valerio in Tuscany which were opened recently by the Minister of Corporations. It is expected that they will supply in full Italy's tin requirements.

At the paper and printing corporations the eminent chemist, Professor Giordani, member of the Italian Academy, examined recent achievements in manufacturing cellulose from wheat and rice straw, hemp husks and chestnut wood waste. The paper obtained from cellulose thus prepared is being used by the Government Supplies Department with entire satisfaction.

The wood corporation is studying ways and means for increasing Italy's forestry resources so as to supply the 200,000 tons of wood now imported. There is talk of launching a big national effort at reafforestation at a cost of 2,000,000,000 lire to be spread over a period of 20 years with direct contributions from the Government and from the industries which would more directly benefit thereby—the paper, artificial fibre, and chemical trades, animal husbandry, the electric power industry, etc.

Safe Car Driving Gains In Ontario

Christian Science Monitor

TORONTO—The safety campaign recently instituted by the Ontario Department of Highways to bar irresponsible and negligent motorists from the roads of the Province, under which citizens have been asked to report to the department instances of bad driving on the part of motorists, already has met with success, according to officials of the department.

The department, it was explained, has a list of 250,000 names of drivers who have bad marks against them, and if a person is reported his record is checked by the department. If he has been involved in any accidents, even though they may not have been entirely his fault, he is notified to appear before department officials, when his license may be suspended or he is ordered to take a new driving test.

While each case is dealt with on its own merits, it was intimated that if a driver has two or more accidents against him and the complaint of the citizen is substantiated, his license is usually suspended. In addition suspensions ordered by the courts must also be observed and cannot run concurrently with the one imposed by the department.

Dr. Colijn

restored national morale. He managed to reduce unemployment. Himself taking the portfolios of Colonies and Defense, he gathered almost all parties around him in a truly national Cabinet.

In those years he saw the rise of a Netherlands National Socialist party and its fall. A veteran in politics, he spoke in 35 towns during a lively election campaign against Communism and against National Socialism, to win his greatest victory and to see these two extremist creeds each lose half their previous support in the country.

He had again been nominated Prime Minister by the Queen, who had already bestowed upon him the highest honors. He has the confidence not only of his party but of the nation.

When he addresses a meeting, he prays with his hearers for all the country's needs and particularly for the many thousands in need of work. His prayer is universal and prophetic, for he proclaims God as the Prime cause.

He does not strive after effects, and dresses with care. He is of medium stature. His face has deep lines, his eyes lie sunken behind eyelids shriveled by the tropical sun. His short-clipped, white hair is brushed back in military fashion. He looks deeply serious as a rule, but he can laugh whole-heartedly. He is witty and in debate is a born fencer. He has a gift of the word, and speaks in a clear voice, direct, businesslike, simple, without any other effect than that of conviction.

State's Dictation On Factory Sites Interests Savants

NOTTINGHAM, Eng. Sept. 7.—An added point was given by economists' discussions of industrial problems at the British Association session here today by news that organized labor in Britain has decided to seek the assistance of natural scientists.

Before settling down to hear a paper on a policy regarding depressed areas the savants learned that the Trades Union Congress, meeting simultaneously at Norwich, has announced its intention to appoint a natural scientific advisory council.

Probably labor at Norwich will be equally interested to hear answers to today's main query among the economists: Should governments dictate where industrialists erect factories?

Inducements to Industrialists

This question was put today to the economic science section of the British Association by Mr. S. R. Dennison, lecturer in economics at Manchester University.

Mr. Dennison suggested that present plans for state control of industrial sites fail to solve the real difficulties that lie behind the existence of depressed areas.

The continuance of localized depressions has resulted in proposals to subject location to control, he recalled. But it appears, he stated, that neither of two possible lines of readjustment, development of new industries and transfer of workers, is likely to solve the problem completely.

An intermediate stage, he continued, is the provision of various inducements to industrialists to establish their plants in depressed areas. Those which have been proposed, Mr. Dennison said, involve certain difficulties and it is not certain whether they would be effective.

Balance of Cost and Gain

"The primary decision which is necessary is whether a policy which has important long-run effects," he pointed out, "involving changes in the whole industrial structure of the country, is appropriate for dealing with a short-run problem."

The appropriateness of control further depends, Mr. Dennison added, upon a balancing of cost against gain. The former could result from a loss of industrial efficiency; the latter would be derived from alleviation of localized unemployment and some saving, perhaps, in capital construction.

This problem of industrial location is looming big now in the researches both of government and economist. This has been distinctly shown at the association meetings where discussions in reference to site planning have taken up quite a large proportion of time.

Prof. P. Sargent Florence, president of the economic section, dealt with the problem in his opening address. He put it that the problem of location is to ensure that the state, when directing operations, should make wise choices and not merely open new industries in any particular place out of sympathy.

Best Location of Resources

Quoting the Second Industrial Survey of South Wales, Professor Florence said: "The working of economic forces will eventually bankrupt any concerns which have made a wrong choice and will thus ensure for the community the optimum distribution of its resources, but only after an interval of confusion, and possibly after the creation of fresh pools of stagnant labor unable to find an outlet. A better choice made now would ensure the earlier attainment of the optimum location of resources, and would eliminate much confusion and waste.

"Though in form a wisely conceived State direction of location might appear to be an interference with the working of 'natural' forces, it might in fact prove to have been only a short cut to the equilibrium which the free working of those forces would eventually ensure."

Professor Florence also added that one of the main problems affecting economists nowadays is that of the distributive trades where tests of efficiency fail to concur.

Replanning of Distribution

Research workers in Britain hope to lower prices all round by replanning the distribution industry, it was revealed here yesterday.

The question which has them guessing at the moment is: can you replan the customer?

Distribution costs account for a third of the final price of most goods and preliminary investigations show, it is said, that the distributive industry is too expensive. Economists would like to make a new census of distribution to make rationalization easier, since present statistics are insufficient.

Mr. H. G. Selfridge Jr., director of one of London's largest stores, gave a warning, however, that rationalization of the distributive industry is going to be a very difficult proposition. Between the research worker and a planned system of distribution there stands, he said, the consumer, an "erratic" force, exercising a great deal of control.

Census of Distribution

Mr. H. T. Weeks, economist, told of a trial census of distribution, undertaken to prove how valuable a complete census on wider lines would be.

This trial census was taken in six towns of equal size. The results, Mr. Weeks declared, disclosed surprising variety between the six towns.

"The trial census was frankly propaganda," he continued, "to prove to business in distribution that a census would be valuable. Specifically it would help in fixing sales quotas, guiding local sales drives, and determining development policy.

"But," he added, "the census has more than a mere commercial interest. It suggests that if control is necessary in distribution, existing statistics are insufficient. It shows that a census of distribution is essential to distributors to administrators and to theorists."

Higher Salaries Asked For Virginia Teachers

Christian Science Monitor

RICHMOND, Va.—Dr. Sidney B. Hall, state superintendent of public instruction, cited "abominably low salaries paid generally" as the principal caused of Virginia's failure to hold the highest caliber instructors in the system. County school superintendents have sought his aid, Dr. Hall said, after advising him that they had trouble in finding teachers capable of filling positions for vocational work.

There are enough certified teachers in the State, he said, but he expressed concern for the future of the educational system if private industry continued to "attract our best teachers with high salaries." Dr. Hall said that in one southwestern Virginia county the average wage scale of teachers in elementary and high schools was only $336 for an eight-month term. Three other counties paid $456, $472 and $432, respectively. Exclusive of supervisors and principals the average yearly pay received by Virginia teachers is $740.

Nonesuch House

London Bridge was formerly adorned with a solid row of habitable houses. Among them was Nonesuch House, referred to as "the most curious and splendid building adorning the bridge." The structure was made in Holland in 1577 and transported to London, where it was pieced together with wooden pegs. There was not a single nail in the entire edifice.

Nonesuch House stood on London Bridge from 1577 to 1771. My drawing was made from an old engraving of the period.

Paris Cabinet Hesitant Over Money Measure

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

PARIS, Oct. 2—Despite the optimistic statement issued by the Finance Ministry to bolster the falling franc, a clear-cut announcement on the government's monetary policy, upon which the fate of the Chautemps Cabinet hangs, is not expected until after the important cantonal elections on October 10 and 17, observers pointed out today.

The Cabinet at its meeting today failed to announce any practical measures to protect the national currency because of the division of opinion on practicable measures to deal with currency reform. Some Socialists, it is learned, want a strict control of the exchange, while others favor a liberal market.

In view of the important changes in the political situation which are expected from the forthcoming elections, the Cabinet intends to sit tight and postpone all practical measures. Confidence is still lacking in the franc and although the current situation is not as bad as it was a month ago when the rediscount rate was lowered, financial circles are still uneasy over prospects of a stable franc.

Friends Defend Crowded Nations' Right to Expand

SWARTHMORE, Penna., Sept. 3.—Germany, Italy and Japan should be given the right to develop natural resources and undeveloped land, William I. Hull, history professor at Swarthmore College, told a discussion group at the Friends World Conference yesterday. Had the nations adopted this method in time and with entire sincerity, or even with sacrifice, Professor Hull said, the Ethiopian and Chinese, and very probably the Spanish, disasters would not have occurred.

His comment was made at a discussion of methods of achieving international justice. The discussion group stressed the Japanese, German and Italian situations of the present as examples of the necessity of considering justice on an international rather than only on a national basis. It was advocated that the United States adopt the quota basis for Japanese immigration and that international provisions should be made for relieving the pressure of population such as exists in Italy.

Sir John H. Harris, former member of the British Parliament, told the conference that the life of the Negro share-cropper in the deep South is "much worse than anything I have ever seen in Africa."

In Modern Dress

The schoolboy conception of a Quaker with his high-crowned, broad-brimmed hat and somber clothes is only a memory these days. Even the women, with the exception of one or two, attending the conference have discarded that traditional close-fitting caps and long flowing gray dresses for the most modern attire.

Ella Newlin of Earlham, Iowa, represents the old tradition in dress at the conference. Her gray dress with its high collar, tight bodice and flowing skirt and black silk cap for a head covering recalls the time such attire was customary for Quaker maids.

Quakers of other countries—they come from 23 nations outside of the United States are hardly distinguishable from the American Friends in the matter of dress. A few however appear in their native dress. Japanese and Chinese women delegates wear the customary kimono garb. A delegate from India clings to his turban.

Hot weather causes little discomfort to a group of English schoolboys who wear shorts, white shirt and leave long legs exposed, nor to Austrian delegates who appear in Tyrolean shorts. The Englishman who brought heavy tweeds to the conference suffers.

Nationalism Deplored

Dangers of nationalism to individual Christians were pointed out by Dr. Henry J. Cadbury, Harvard University professor, in an address at a public meeting in Swarthmore field house. Dr. Cadbury termed nationalism a form of religion and asserted that it was the enemy of individual liberty and world brotherhood, cherished by Quakers.

He saw tension between the church and state increasing, asserting that "the steam roller of economic regimentation, of conscription, even of idea, appears again on our horizon." Americans, he said, must realize that a church-state conflict is possible even in this country.

Ex-US Champion of the maneuvers they will perform here each day of the racing program.

Eighteen navy fighters came from Norfolk. They are in command of Lieut. Comdr. W. S. Cunningham. Nineteen pursuit planes flew in from Langley Field, in command of Captain Ned Schramm. Thirteen marine bombers from Quantico were in command of Captain Christian F. Schilt.

Roger Don Rae, the 1936 champion, qualified for six major events when he averaged 242 miles an hour in two laps of the five-mile course today. The National Aeronautic Association declared Rae the United States champion of racers and parachute jumpers on a basis of his performance in all events entered last year.

During six of the last seven years Rae has won the majority of national jumping contests by landing closer to a mark on the field than other contenders. Today he said he would not be in the jumps this year.

"You've got to quit some time," he said. "I decided to do it before something went wrong."

He is flying a Folker Special powered by a four-cylinder Menasco engine rated at 150-horsepower and supercharged to develop 250 horsepower.

German Demonstrates Stunts

Captain Ott Hagenburg thrilled the most blase airport attendants by a rehearsal of the acrobatic flight he is scheduled to do daily. Several times he flew across the field upside down and so low it appeared he was grazing the grass. He is flying a Bucker Jungmeister, a small biplane powered by a Bramo engine of 160 horsepower. Count Hagenburg brought the plane here from Germany especially for exhibition flights. He is the European champion.

Among other pilots who qualified for the races today was Arthur Chester of Los Angeles. He flew a special racer called The Jeep and made 246.4 miles an hour. George H. Gooch of Los Angeles qualified at 235.6 miles an hour in a Schoenfeldt-Rider racer.

All the special racers are smaller and faster than those of previous years. The wing span of each averages from twelve to sixteen feet. Their power plants range from around 100 horsepower to 450 horsepower, excepting entries for the Thompson and Bendix races. Piston displacement in the majority of events is limited to 337.549 and 566 cubic inches. There is no limit on power on the Bendix and Thompson events.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

New Arctic Route Opened by 2 Ships

ON BOARD S.S. NASCOPIE, Prince Regent Inlet, Canada, Sept. 3—Second Northwest Passage across the top of the world was charted today when two ships met in the waters of Bellot Strait.

The meeting of the vessels, fulfilling the 400-year-old dream of Elizabethan explorers, marked the discovery of a new and shorter water route between Eastern and Western Canada.

Cautiously feeling its way through the unknown waters of Bellot Strait, the Hudson Bay Company's ship Nascopie sighted the schooner Aklavik, faintly silhouetted in a light snowstorm.

The encounter took place at a rocky headland on the most northerly tip of the Canadian mainland, where the narrow strait separates Boothia Peninsula from Somerset Island.

The Nascopie had come from Montreal, the Aklavik from Cambridge Bay in the Mackenzie region of the Western Arctic.

It was the first time a ship had traversed unsounded Bellott Strait.

When the Aklavik and the Nascopie made their contact Eskimos from the Eastern Arctic and the Western Mackenzie River district aboard the ships made the ice-bound wilderness echo with cheers.

Major D. L. McKeand, commander of the Eastern Arctic patrol, greeted Patsy Klingenberg, famous trader and interpreter of the Western Arctic.

Offers a Safer Ship Route

When it becomes fully charted, the Bellot Strait passage will offer not only a shorter route, but a safer one, than the Lancaster Sound-Barrows Strait passage from the Eastern to Western Canada, it was said. The original route, ice-bound most of the year, has been traversed only three or four times since Roald Amundsen's three-year voyage (1903-1906) over the treacherous route.

During a broadcast from the Nascopie, Major McKeand suggested that a bay or headland on this rocky, narrow fiord be named after Captain T. F. Smellie, the ship's veteran skipper, to commemorate the first crossing of Bellot Strait.

The Bellot route has been under consideration by Arctic explorers since 1858, when Captain Thomas McClintock, searching for the lost Franklin expedition, tried to run it. He failed and others have failed since until the success of the Nascopie.

The mysterious flares seen from this ship while anchored in Bellot Strait Wednesday night were explained today with the arrival here of the Hudson's Bay Company agent, L. D. Learmonth.

He said that he had been icebound when traveling across Boothia Peninsula to meet the Nascopie here and had set off flares to indicate he was approaching. He arrived here by canoe.

When the flares were first seen, all hands aboard this vessel, which has been conducting the Eastern Arctic patrol, speculated on the possibility that they might be signals from the six missing Russian Polar fliers.

Ship Broadcast Heard in U.S.

In a broadcast originating from the Nascopie and the Aklavik in Bellot Strait, last night, officers of the two ships described to an audience in the United States the chartering of the new route. The broadcast was picked up by the Canadian Broadcasting Company, which relayed it to the National Broadcasting Company. NBC re-broadcast it over a wide network from 11:05 until 11:15.

The captains of both ships and Major McKeand spoke. The broadcast was surprisingly clear, NBC officials said, although the ships were anchored at a point about 150 miles north of the magnetic pole.

For many centuries, and especially since Elizabethan times, explorers sought a northeast or southwest passage that would connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through the Arctic regions. Passages have been found, but most of them require travel far into the Arctic Circle.

Since this latest discovery (the passage through the Bellot Strait) it has been necessary for ships traveling across the top of North America to use Barrow Strait and Lancaster Sound for journeys between the east and the west in the Arctic region.

Lancaster Sound is the direct route into Baffin Bay. Ships seeking to enter Hudson Bay from the north use Barrow Strait and then head southward through Prince Regent Inlet and the Gulf of Boothia.

It is where these two waters meet that Bellot Strait extends east and west, separating Boothia and Somerset Island. The fact that there was such a strait was discovered in 1852 by Lieutenant J. Bellot of the French Navy, but until now it was never believed to be navigable or even open for navigation.

Much Travel Is Saved Ships

The strait is more than 100 miles south of Barrow Strait, the present route, and is in a more favorable latitude. It is now possible for ships to save several hundred miles by avoiding the northward loop around Somerset Island on their way to the Beaufort Sea and Bering Strait to the west or to other parts of Canada to the east.

Captain J. Ross, who, in 1831, discovered the position of the North Magnetic Pole on the wetsern side of Boothia while he was seeking a northwest passage, passed by Bellot Strait, but either did not see it or considered it unnavigable. For several years he and his party were in the vicinity of the strait, but abandoned their explorations after discovering King William Land, and were picked up by whalers in Barrow Strait, where they were stranded.

Struck Out 40 in One Game

Spectators at a baseball game in Berthold, North Dakota, on August 27, 1926, saw a pitching battle the like of which they would not see again in a lifetime, in either major league, minor league or any other kind of baseball. The score was tied 1-1 in the 8th, and it took 11 more innings for the Minot team to score the winning runs. In those 20 innings Phil Hoffman of the Minot crowd fanned 40 men, while his opponent struck out 28.

A Bermuda Puzzle

Everywhere one goes in Bermuda, it is noticed that graves and gravestones in all the cemeteries face true east. It is just Bermudian custom. Yet in a corner of the Castle Harbor Golf Links, tucked away in a wall-enclosed space, is an old cemetery that defies both custom and knowledge of origin. The cemetery has no name, yet there are some 30 graves in it, none of which have been covered over during the ages. And not a single one of the gravestones has a name or anything to indicate in whose memory it exists.

Legionnaires Approve Child Labor And Aid Laws

ALBANY, Ore.—A four-point social welfare plan was adopted by legionnaires from 93 Oregon posts at the annual convention held here. The program as outlined by Guy Cordon of Roseburg, department commander, included continued organization for disaster relief, enforcement of present child labor laws, demand for state aid for war orphans and continuation of boys' state self-government camps.

Besides this was decision to promote a highway safety in cooperation with government and civic agencies. The Rev. Joseph Lonergan past national chaplain, was one of the speakers.

Panama Would Duck Under Canal

Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON, Sept. 3—Panama wants the United States to construct a transportation tunnel under the canal zone. Minister Boyd told state department officials today his Central American Republic, divided by the canal, needs greater transportation facilities between the two parts.

A small ferry with facilities for 22 cars is the only connecting link now.

Mr. Boyd, who made an "unofficial" request for consideration of the proposal, suggested it be paid for out of canal tolls. He estimated the cost at $2,000,000.

Italian Wool From Skim Milk Enters World's Textile Trade

Christian Science Monitor

NAPLES, Italy—Italian cows are working overtime. For not only is Bossyietta supplying the ideal food for babies, but she is entering the clothing business as well.

When Dino Grandi, Italian Ambassador to Great Britain, returned to London wearing a suit of artificial wool made from 170 pints of waste skim milk, sheep growers sat up and took notice. And well they might, for a cousin to rayon, on the wool side of the family, has entered the textile world.

Lanital, as this substitute for wool is called, is the result of three years of experimentation carried on by Antonio Ferretti at Milan, the center of Itayl's richest dairy country. The artificial wool resembles in most ways the finer wools of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Since the manufacturing process is so similar to that of rayon, practically the same type of machinery can be used for both products. Therefore, the industrial development of larital is in the hands of the Snia Viscosa Company, an important rayon establishment at Cosano Maderno.

A hundred pounds of milk are used to produce three pounds of lanital. The wool substitute is obtained from the casein left in the skim milk after the butter fat has been removed, hence forming a valuable by-product for the creameries. The casein is treated chemically and then squeezed through a fine nozzle, from which it passes through an acid bath, condensing baths, and washed and dried. It then appears much the same as any other fibre which may be woven, spun, or dyed.

The Italian boosters for lanital of course claim great things for their new product. British sheep-raising interests are inclined to pooh-pooh all the fuss made about it. The truth of the matter is that lanital is yet in the beginning stages of development. Just as rayon was reviled at first, and has been improved unbelievably since, so is lanital going through a period of change. Remarkable advances have been made already, as shown by the differences in the laboratory reports which depend on the time when the sample was obtained.

At the present time, lanital is best used when mixed with natural wool. So far the artificial wool does not have the shrinking power that is characteristic of the natural product. This is of advantage in the stocking industry, where shrinkage is not desired. But where felting is necessary, 50 per cent of the natural wool must be added to obtain satisfactory results.

The first samples presented officially to the Italian Government were smiled upon by Premier Mussolini and consequently the details of the process are strictly guarded. So far the secret of [illegible] has baffled the foreign dairy chemists.

Lanital assumes international importance, even though Italy does keep the process to herself.

US Rail Ferry System

or floats daily between Manhattan Island and the mainland. For many year, prior to the construction of the Hell Gate Bridge, through passenger trains between Boston and Washington were ferried across New York harbor. This service, however, has since been discontinued.

There are likewise car ferry operation at other Atlantic seaboard ports, but none is operated on such a large scale as at New York. Boston, Baltimore and Philadelphia and various other cities have these facilities available for the handling of commerce, while across the lower Chesapeake Bay, ferry service is maintained between Cape Charles, Old Point Comfort, Portsmouth, Newport News and Norfolk. Freight cars, but not passenger trains, are ferried across the bay there, while passengers and automobiles are handled in steamers that have been streamlined in keeping with the very latest in railroad equipment.

Ferry To Havana

In addition, there is operated from Port Everglades, near Fort Lauderdale, Fla., an ocean car ferry to Hanava, Cuba, a distance of about 270 miles. Prior to the hurricane in the fall of 1935, this service was maintained from Key West. The boats in this service, similar in many respects to those operating on Lake Michigan, handle from 26 to 30 freight cars at a time but do not accommodate passengers or automobiles. Another ocean-going service, for the transportation of freight cars, is maintained between New York, Havana and New Orleans with specially built vessels that can handle as many as 100 freight cars at a time.

Car ferries play an important part in the handling of commerce at San Francisco, Oakland, Seattle and other ports on the Pacific Coast. Canadian railroads too, from their terminals at Vancouver, British Columbia, and their Atlantic seaboard outlets operate car ferries as connecting links of their rail facilities.

In Europe, Asia, Africa and South America, there are a number of car ferry links in railway routes, some crossing broad rivers that intercept rail lines, others connecting rail lines on islands which constitute a part of the country, and still others connecting the railways of different countries, thus providing international train service.

One of the newest of these is that which recently opened between Dover, England, and Dunkirk, France, for the handling of passenger trains. There are other foreign deep sea car ferry lines between European countries, as well as between some of the Japanese Islands and the mainland, but in few, if any, cases are the conditions of operation as severe as those to be found on Lake Michigan, where bitter storms, heavy ice throughout the winter months and a heavy volume of traffic always to be moved often make operation difficult.

Cardenas Urges Equal Rights For Mexican Women

Christian Science Monitor

MEXICO, D. F.—The recommendation that equal rights be granted to the Mexican woman was the most unexpected development in the address made by President Cardenas at the opening of the 37th Congress. The presidential support came after years of agitation by Mexican suffragettes, culminating in an intensive campaign during the past year.

A sound basis for social evolution will not be achieved until the Constitution is reformed to grant women equal rights, said President Cardenas. He answered the frequent statement that the Mexican man emerges from the same limited background and should exercise the same tolerance in judging women that the women have in judging the men.

"If the men could see beyond our own egotism," said the President, "we would recognize the fact that the Mexican woman has been in the vanguard of the fight for the social and economic emancipation of our nation." Specifically, the President praised the part that women have taken in developing schools, in aiding union organization, and in attempting to better conditions in the home.

Reviews Federal Program

A general review of his program during the past year was made by President Cardenas. He stressed the economic principles and development of his program. The financial policy of his government has been to increase the productive capacity of the country through providing credit for small industries and agriculture and in assuring the workers of a just share of the profits, he said.

Idle capital has been put to work through the channels of such federal credit organizations as the National Bank of Agricultural Credit, the National Bank of Ejidal Credit, cooperative societies operating small industries, the National Bank of Foreign Commerce, and similar institutions, he pointed out.

These units have supplied working capital to organizations unsupported by private capital, said the President, but he urged that private banks respond to the economic expansion of the country and join the government in opening new fountains of production. Such private organizations should acquire a character of social as well as economic service, he stated.

More Public Works

The continued policy of the Government will be to make only essential payments on the public debt, said President Cardenas, preferring to invest all available funds in the program of public works. These projects include the building of dams and irrigation works and the opening of communications system, such as highways and railways and the improvement of ports.

The success of his program is attested by the fact that the Government's income has been increasing steadily since he took office, the President stated. The estimated income for 1936 was 328,000,000 pesos and the actual income was 331,000,000 pesos. From August, 1936, to July, 1937, the estimated income was 354,000,000 pesos and the actual income was 372,000,000. Such surpluses, he said, are immediately invested in the public works program.

In addition, the position of the monetary reserve has improved, with resources mounting from 205,871,000 pesos in September, 1936, to 216,654,000 pesos in June, 1937, the President declared. These figures exclude silver guaranteeing monetary certificates. The proportion of the gold reserve has been maintained within legal limits, but not been increased for fear of a possible fall in gold prices in the world market, he said.

Results of Land Division

The vast extent to which the agrarian law of land division is being applied was revealed in the President's report that during the past year 1,811,823 acres of land have been given to 275,879 communal farmers. These divisions have been made chiefly in the states of Coahuila, Durango, Lower California, Yucatan and Campeche. In addition to these there are 14,645 agrarian projects waiting to be resolved, he said.

The President stated that the Government has continued to support labor organization in order to insure the worker a just share of profits, but warned against inter-union and political conflicts which disrupt industry. Such conflicts menace the strong position of labor and militate against the collective welfare, he said.

Chief accomplishments of the past year cited by the President were: creation of the Departments of Publicity and of Infant Welfare; creation of the General Administration of National Petroleum to develop federal oil reserves; passage of the Expropriation Law; the proposal to permit union organization among civil service employes; the proposal to establish a department of General Ways of Communication; a project for establishing Cooperative Societies; a proposed law fixing the responsibilities of government officials, and the study now in progress for a Social Security Law.

Bumper Crops In US Promise Era Of Plenty

Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11—The horn of plenty has burst wide open on the United States this year, according to the unadorned but exhilarating forecasts given out last night by the Department of Agriculture. Exhilarating, that is, to consumers; not so encouraging to producers who already note dropping prices as a result of nature's bounty in its relation to visible markets.

In 17 out of 25 leading farm commodities, crops will be much greater than last year and somewhat in excess of the high five-year average from 1928-32. Crops expected to exceed the average include wheat, cotton, rye, rice, hay, grain sorghums, beans, apples, peaches, pears, grapes, pecans, potatoes, sweet potatoes, tobacco, sugar beets and hops.

Corn just failed to get into the better-than-average list in a surprising scaling down of Aug. 1 estimates by 100,000,000 bushels to leave the Sept. 1 forecast at 2,549,000,000. But this compares with last year's crop of 1,529,327,000 bushels, and is scarcely below the five-year average before 1932 of 2,554,772,000 bushels. August drought in Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri cut the 4 per cent slice off the estimates.

They'll Get Along Somehow

But here is bad news for the zoo dwellers and the baseball fans. Peanuts are off. Definitely off. Of all the commodities survived, the goobers alone will fall below last year's mark. But this is largely because peanuts did so well last year. The yield is estimated at 1,258,000,000 pounds—some 40,000,000 pounds below last year's production, but still above the average crop.

The wheat crop is estimated at 885,950,000 bushels, which is 259,000,000 bushels above last year's low level, and 21,000,000 bushels greater than the average.

The expected harvests of oats, barley, buckwheat and flaxseed will be less than average, but considerably above last year's production.

With renewed forecasts of bumper crops all along the line, talk of a special session of Congress to devise crop control legislation sprang up again in Washington. President Roosevelt is expected to make up his mind about calling such a session after he has crossed the continent and seen farming conditions at first hand.

But many of his advisers, notably the congressional leaders, are eager for such a session. Even within the Cabinet, Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, has declared that a special session to deal with the farm problem would be "highly desirable."

Partly to meet the serious price slumps experienced in the cotton market, the Government has embarked—under the pressure of the cotton bloc in Congress—upon a crop loan and subsidy plan tending to give cotton growers something approaching a pegged price of 12 cents a pound. Possibility that the same pressures will bring about a loan and subsidy program for corn or other crops suffering from declining prices is now definitely seen.

No Bad Break in Prices

But corn and wheat prices have not yet broken badly, corn is down, but wheat seems likely to maintain a good level because of a notably short crop in Canada and only average crops overseas.

The estimated production of 885,950,000 bushels of wheat this year—688,145,000 of winter varieties and 197,805,000 of spring—would be only 2 per cent above the average but 41 per cent over last year's crop. There have been five successive years of below-average wheat crops, so the carryover is reduced to a very low point. Prices are considered unlikely to slide off seriously for many months, probably not before another year.

Some of the subsidiary crops are in very good shape. The second largest rice crop in 28 years is seen, 51,599,000 bushels is indicated, with a very high yield of 51.4 bushels an acre.

Fruit and nut crops are also extremely bountiful: making the horn of plenty look promising for Thanksgiving time. The apple harvest is set at 204,319,000 bushels, of the largest in six years and 25 per cent above average. Pears are expected to set a long-time record, at 30,311,000 bushels, and grapes, estimated at 2,574,710 tons, would be close to 1928's record high. Peaches, however, are only slightly above average at 59,396,000 bushels.

The hay crop is more satisfactory than in recent years, being placed at 84,803,000 tons with a carryover of 6,011,000 tons. Tobacco is the largest of the last five crops, at 1,448,375,000 pounds.

P. and O. Fleet's Centenary

Progress Noted In Every Direction; Further Developments Expected During Second Century Of Famous Company

Times, London

When the Peninsular Steam Navigation Company was formed in September, 1837, for the purpose of developing steamship connections from London and Falmouth to India, in association with the Admiralty, it boasted that in the Don Juan, of 933 tons and 320 horsepower, and the Tagus, of 900 tons and 300 horsepower it had "the largest and most powerful steamships that had yet been put afloat." They made the first stage of the long chain of communications, and went as far as Gibraltar carrying her Majesty's mails for Vigo, Oporto, Lisbon, and Cadiz. The ships were described in contemporary Press records as combining first-class elegance with comfort. Separate cabins for parties and families could be engaged, and the "liberal table with wines" was included in the fares.

These wonderful wooden paddle steamers took, under favorable conditions, 54 hours from Falmouth to Bigo, 84 hours to Lisbon, and seven days to Gibraltar, including a stay of 24 hours at Libson and six hours at Cadiz. The passage from Gibraltar to Malta, which was in Admiralty hands, took about five days, and from Malta to Alexandria, whence started the overland route, about four days.

Meanwhile, with the steady development of the company's services, the introduction of the direct sea communication via the Suez Canal, and the further extension of the connections with the East, the size of the ships grew, and during the evolution there came into the nomenclature of the fleet names which have become household words and which crop up from time to time in the century of progress with which the P. & O. have been associated. Himalaya, China, Salsette, Mooltan, Hindostan, Cathay, Malaja, and Kaisar-i-Hind recur during the years, marking steady progression and the further infiltration of the Orient and Australia under successive regimes.

It was the wish of the late Lord Inchcape, when he succeeded Sir Thomas Sutherland, to evolve a new type of liner which would introduce into the P. & O. fleet vessels embodying many of the modern features which were finding their way into vessels on other routes, while at the same time to keep in mind the peculiar nature of the Indian and Australian trades, which could not command that wealthy clientele which sets the pace on the New York service. It was also his particular desire that the ships should not have inside cabins and that, so far possible, every one should have a porthole.

Outside Cabins

This was achieved in the Nadera and Narkunda, of about 16,000 tons, and built in 1920, which also embodied a system of cabin arrangement conceived by Lord Inchcape when he was Sir James Lyle Mackay. With the exception of one or two berths on the second class there were no inside passenger cabins. This same idea was introduced about the same time into several of older "M" class ships, as, after War service, they came back for refitting and reconditioning. It is also characteristic either in its entirety or with modifications in later ships of the fleet.

At the same time the traditional arrangement of the public rooms was abandoned to conform with modern ideas of comfort. The proportion of single-berth cabins was increased and veranda cafes were introduced.

An almost revolutionary departure and a complete break from the earlier process of evolution was the decision, when planning the Viceroy of India, to have turbo-electric machinery which in a ship of 20,000 tons was unique to this country. Not only this, but Lord Inchcape conceived the idea of making all the first-class cabins single-berth rooms with, naturally, inter-communication for family reasons and for convenience in arranging suites de luxe. The P. & O., like the Cape and South American interests, were finding increasing demands for "luxury" apartments, by then a common feature on the North Atlantic. This ideal could be achieved only by departing from the principle adopted in the Naidera and Narkunda, and reintroducing inside cabins. Here the designers were helped by improved methods of trunk ventilation, which enabled passengers to have an abundance of fresh air at controlled temperatures and without the use of electric fans in the cabins. Knowledge of these developments in ventilation was already breaking down the prejudice of travelers against inner cabins, and the decision of the P. and O. in this connection showed how completely it was abreast of the times.

As each new ship came along and the facilities at the Suez Canal improved, opportunity was taken to increase the size.

In the meantime the close association between the P. & O. and the Orient Line was tending, for economic reasons, to standardize to some extent the size and general proportions of the ships for the Australian service, on which the Straths are mainly employed. Consequently it has been found possible to build at Barrow ships of identical dimensions and machinery while, however, preserving the individuality of each line so far as the general arrangement of the passenger accommodation is concerned, the distribution of the cabins and public rooms and even the external appearance. The convenience of being able to order sister ships in this way resulted in the P. & O. reverting to geared turbines in the Strathmore of 1935, which was slightly larger at 23,400 tons than the other two, and in Strathallan of similar size now building at Barrow.

The Stratheden, which was launched on June 10 and will enter service this year, is 664ft. 6in. long overall and will be capable of a speed of 21 knots. She will carry a crew of 563.

There is to be accommodation for 448 first-class passengers—216 in single and 232 in two-berth rooms. A considerable proportion of the cabins will have a bath room attached and all other cabins in both first and tourist classes will have both hot and cold fresh water laid on to the wash basins. There are two vice-regal suites and six cabins de luxe. An innovation is the provision of telephones in all first-class cabins with telephone call boxes on several decks. The sports deck, 275ft. long by 82ft. wide, is supplemented by a "Lido" on the deck below, comprising a swimming pool, veranda cafe and bar with seating round the pool and ample space for sun-bathing. The children have a nursery, a separate dining saloon, and their own reserved deck space for play. The Stratheden will carry 563 tourist class passengers with a full range of public rooms, a nursery, swimming bath, sports areas, and a covered dancing space. There are also electric lifts in both classes. In addition to modern trunk ventilation, air-conditioning plant has been installed for the first-class dining room.

In every direction there has been progress, and the alert management of the company and the shrewdness with which it is conducted indicate that during the second century there will be further developments which it would be too bold to attempt to visualize.

Chinese Behave In Odd Manner, Says Explorer

By ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS

N. Y. Herald Tribune

Years ago when I first went to the Orient and began to deal with Chinese officials, I learned that if I were ever going to get anywhere I'd have to do as the Chinese do. As a result, I have in my life put on several pretty swell sit-down strikes. One of them was when I was en route to the old city of Sian-fu, out in Shensi province.

At the time of which I am writing the railroad reached only halfway to Sian, and it was a ten-day trip on muleback from its end to the ancient city. Captain Collins, a British officer, and I were on a hunt for the "Golden Fleece"—the Shensi takin—one of the rarest animals of the world. We were armed with a letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Peking, asking all officials to facilitate our expedition. At the end of the railroad we transferred our belongings to an unusually filthy Chinese inn. I remember it particularly both because of its dirt and because the landlord rejoiced in the name of Er-tutsa (Second Stomach).

I asked him, "Why the name?"

"Oh," said he, "there really isn't such a thing as a second stomach, and if there were it wouldn't be of much use. So my parents named me that in order to throw off the track the devil who is always looking about to kill children who are particularly beloved. When he heard me always called Er-tutsa he thought I wasn't of much importance."

After Collins and I had established ourselves at the Inn of the Second Stomach we sent our cards to the magistrate at his Official residence, the Yamen, and in due course presented ourselves with a request that he procure five mules for us. (From Second Stomach we had learned that all the mules of the city had been commandeered by the magistrate).

He received us with due courtesy and assured us that the mules would be at our inn that same evening. But they didn't arrive. A call at the Yamen next morning and renewed assurances that they would appear that day. Evening came, and no mules. Repetition on the third day—and we began to smell a mouse. The magistrate evidently did not intend to give us mules.

We could see dozens of mules standing idle about the city, but none for us! Then we learned that the magistrate was extremely anti-foreign and had boasted that these two foreign devils would get no mules from him. The whole city was waiting to see us humiliated.

Collins and I took council. What to do? A sit-down strike at the Yamen was certainly indicated. Therefore the next morning we made our usual call on the magistrate. Again he assured us that the delay was unavoidable; that he had not been able to produce our mules, but certainly they would be forthcoming that night.

Then we did the unexpected. I told the magistrate, in my best Chinese, that we realized what superhuman efforts he was making in our behalf, and that we could not thank him enough; that perhaps the mules might arrive at the Yamen and get lost before they reached our inn. Therefore, in order to avoid such a distressing possibility, we would wait at the Yamen until they came; that since we did not wish to trouble him we had instructed our servant to bring our folding chairs and table, and that we would just settle ourselves on the front porch.

There wasn't much that he could say. His smile was pretty thin as he bowed us out, but the spectators grinned broadly.

On the porch our boy was waiting with the camp furniture. He set up our table and chair, produced books and cigarettes, and we settled down comfortably in the sunlight. At noon our cook arrived with his little portable stove and food in a basket. Collins and I lay back in our chairs, comfortably relaxed, feeling that the lot of a sit-down striker was not so bad.

Word of what was happening at the Yamen had gone out into the far places of the city and the narrow street in front resembled a subway jam. We minded this not at all. A foreigner in China soon learns to consider himself as something out of the zoo. And it all worked to our advantage. The magistrate was literally a prisoner in his own house. He could not venture out the front door without having us propound the embarrassing question about the mules. If he left by the back door with the crowd watching it would be an awful "loss of face" and for a Chinese that was unthinkable.

At ten o'clock, even though we weren't tired, Collins and I undressed and got into bed. We thought that would bring results. It did!

Half an hour later there was a terrific row in the packed street. With jingling bells and a chorus of Chinese curses five mules pushed their way into the courtyard. Collins and I dressed leisurely and the boy collected our camp gear. Just as we were about to leave the Yamen the magistrate appeared. It had just been reported to him that the mules had arrived. For three days he had had men combing the countryside to find us proper animals. He was delighted to have been of service. So he said.

Of course, he knew that we knew that the mules had come from just around the corner, but that didn't embarrass him at all.

The Gods of Fortune

Japan's Galaxy Of Seven Deities Of Good-Luck Described

According to the priest Mamiya Yeishu, who superintends the Rinsai sect of Buddhism the Shichi Fukujin or Seven Gods of Fortunes, who are so closely connected with the daily life of the Japanese people, are the creations of the priest Tenkai who was a confidential adviser to Tokugawa Iyeyasu, founder of Tokugawa Shogunate.

One day the autocrat sent for Tenkai, who on appearing, was ordered to prepare for his use a set of maxims calculated to instil sound principles. There is a certain Buddhist scripture called Nio Hannya Kio (Pali: Prajna Vairapani Sutra). In it the following sentence occurs:—"Seven calamities removed there immediately arise seven fortunes." Tenkai thought of this passage, and out of it he created the seven Gods of Fortune. By calamities are meant disastrous fires, floods, earthquakes, sickness, and like occurrences over which humans have no control.

At best, human efforts are directed only towards mitigating the degree of suffering from such happenings. Of these seven Gods, the DAI KOKUTEN is best known. He sits on a pair of rice bags, with a black hood over his head and a hammer in his hand. He carries a bag, the mouth of which is tightly held. His counterpart in Japanese mythology is Okuni-nushi-no-mikoto, and in that of India Mahakala, which term is sometimes translated as the most stressed times. The idea is that out of difficulties come real felicities, and out of darkness light. Daikokuten or Daikokusama looks after gold, silver, and rice.

"If one believes in me, there will be no difficulty whatever in getting a livelihood." This is the motto of this deity. His hood represents the fact of putting a limit to everything, and warns those who are carried too far by ambition, like unto the vast space over-head. The hood is to stop sky-gazing, that is, in a figurative sense. Every one must know the station of life one is in. The sense of modesty is encouraged. The bag says if you have anything in it, you must keep it intact. The idea of losing one's property is deprecated. The hammer indicates the idea of thrift, not merely the shaking of it which brings in a lot of good things as is represented in certain pictures. Utmost industry is enjoined.

Tsuchi, the Japanese word stands for hammer, also phonetically for ground, from which fact it is deduced that agriculture must be resorted to the basis of riches. In Tenkai's time there were no industries, such as modern Japan has. So in a modern sense it must be included in the scope of the hammer, a most fitting idea. . . .hammers moving, and reverberating in the iron mills. Even epitaphs are resorted to, to make clear the meaning of the hammer:

Kono tsuchi wa takara uchidasu
tsuchi de nashi.
Norakura mono no atama utsu
tsuchi

("Tis not a hammer for shaking off precious treasures, but for striking the sluggards' heads),

Kono tsuchi wa takara uchidasu
tsuchi de nashi.
Ogoru kokoro wo utsu ko tsuchi nari.

("Tis not a hammer to strike out precious treasures, but a small hammer for breaking one's pride).

The striking of sluggards' heads must be carried out in a Mussolinian sense, if anything good is intended to be done. Iyeyasu in a way did so. After all Daikoku plainly says those who want to succeeded in this life, so as to have plenty and satisfaction, must do so by hard work and thrift. No use worshipping him for a grant of happiness or of money as he has no ready cash to spare.

Now regarding YEBISU SAMA; this deity is Wakanahiko-no-mikoto according to the Nihon Shoki, the first written history of Japan (published 715-24). Another version has it that he is the progenitor of trade, one who introduced trade in its various branches and taught how to make a success of them. He is represented as fondly caressing a big tai fish and fishing rod. Tai is the most delicious fish, very much liked by the Japanese people. The fishing rod is opportune, condemning the idea of catching fish by net, which act is compared to exploiting customers by hundreds or thousands and though it may be the shortest cut to money marking, it will not succeed in the end. By catching fish by line, it will take a long time: but the idea is to counsel the least possible profit and correspondingly larger sales, which will naturally come by cheaper prices.

BENZAITEN. This deity, generally represented by a charming damsel is invariably connected with lakes and ponds to which they are dedicated. Someone long ago felt spell-bound by the grandeur of the river Ganges, so it was the poetical emotion of beauty which gave birth to this female deity. Another story has it that she is the wife of Bishamon.

Her native name in Pali is Sarasvati. She has a sweet voice and charming manners, which go a long way to captivate the hearts of men. From this fact she was incorporated in the category of the Seven Gods of Fortune. Smiling faces, soft voices, courteous manners are all necessary to traders, shopkeepers, and others who cater to the wishes of other people.

BISHAMON. His native name is Vaisramana, and one of the four heavenly kings, who heard most of Buddha's sermons. He is, therefore, sometimes rendered as Tamonten or "hearing-most-deity." He has an austere face, ready to burst to excessive anger. He carries a spear, life stands for authority. Sometimes when it becomes necessary for a man to assert himself he must do so. This is what Bishamon teaches us. But it must be backed by a conviction or an authority growing out of devotion to one's duty.

HOTEI. This is the surname of that familiar figure of a fat Buddhist priest, carrying a bag. His real name is Kesshi, according to the Japanese way of pronunciation. Hotei means a sack. It is said he is the Maitreya re-born, a Bodhisattva of Mercy—Buddha of lesser rank, which must be undergone before full Buddhaship is attained. He has a big heart, big enough to take in anything. He allows himself no molestation under any circumstances. To be content with what he has got. This is the explanation of the whole line of conduct recommended by him. "Sono hito" as Hotei wrote stands for Amida of the Shinshu sect, or Christ as of Christianity, and according to the Buddhistic metaphysics or Dhyana one must thoroughly become infused into a thing, namely becoming a part and parcel of a phenomenon. In this stage, there will be no grumble nor dissatisfaction, neither occurs there the question of kindliness or faithfulness.

Hotei conveys the idea of being complete by himself or harmonious with everything else. He looks all right either as an ornament for the zabuten (small cushion to sit upon) picture, or for the kamidana (a shelf for Shinto tablet or images of the Gods). Besides Hotei was a very good weather prophet, and the people followed his forecast, which was done by carrying an umbrella. When it was wanting on his person, a spell of good weather was assured. It was also said he could see things even behind his back, so he had no mishaps.

FUKUROKUJI. He occupies the sixth rank in the category of the Seven Gods of Fortune. He has a tremendous long head, which strikes one as possibly longer than his body. Once he had to put up in a vegetable dealer's shop to pass the night. His head protruded so much out of the shop that one of the customers mistook his head for an extraordinary mellon and offered a good price for it. When the mistake was found there was a merry uproar. As for good natured FUKUROKUJIU, there was nothing like his equanimity and and self possession under the worst provocations. Symbolically he stands for the virtues of gentleness and affability.

JIROJIN. This is the seventh and last of the Seven Gods. He stands for a long life, therefore good health, due to the judicious use of outdoor exercise, moderate amount of food, and complete absence of excess in every respect.

The Dawn of Photography

It was an accidental observation that gave Daguerre, that ardent photographer-scientist who died in 1851, his real start at discovery. His tintype was the forerunner of the modern photograph.

One day it is said that he was trying out a new kind of plate. It was of silver that had been fumed with iodine vapor. He permitted light from an object to fall on the plate; but since the exposure was for too short a time, he could see no result. A little tired and somewhat discouraged, he put it away in a closet where he kept his chemicals. The next morning, upon going to the closet, he was amazed to find a clear picture etched on the same plate, which had been blank the day before.

Daguerre was greatly puzzled. Reasoning about it, he decided that something in the closet was responsible. Which of the many chemicals had caused it? Though there were hundreds of bottles he began his patient search. One by one, he took out a chemical at a time, always putting a freshly exposed plate into the closet. The picture formed each time. At last he reached the very last bottle; and removed that one, too. To his surprise and consternation, the picture seemed to form on the plate without any chemical.

He was almost ready to give up in despair when he spied a dish of mercury on the floor of the closet. Could that be it? Once more he prepared a silver plate and exposed it to light. Into his close it went, but this time the dish of mercury was gone. Tweny-four hours later he knew the guilty culprit. It was mercury vapor.

Daguerre became famous. The whole world was interested in his "tintype" pictures. They were crude and expensive; but they were different from anything known before. Men and women were glad to have their pictures taken, even though it required that they cover their faces with white powder and sit in the bright sunshine for half an hour.—American Journal of Pharmacy.

Writer Compares Mitsui With Big Western Firms

Japanese Concern Started Exchange System Ten Years Before Bank Of England Was Founded

By WILLIAM TEELING

This Week

How many people in Lancashire know about the Mitsuis, their greatest cotton rivals in Japan? How many traders with Australia know of the Mitsui system—though the Mitsuis today buy up Australia's wool, and ask of reciprocal sales? What do the great motor industry, the sugar industry and the silk industry of America and of the world know of this House?

Japan is now one of the five greatest powers in the world. In the Orient she is already the greatest power. She can live and support her sixty-million population only by industry and by exports. Half her industry is nominally in the hands of very small men, factory owners employing no more than five or six hands. But the other half is in the hands of four great families; and again, of those four families, the Mitsuis are the most powerful, having, directly and indirectly, control over more than one quarter of the total industry of Japan.

What do we know of this family? Should we despise it as something new, just Japanese, something able to copy but not to invent, a typical copy of such great families as the Siemens of Germany, the Rothschilds, the Mellons or the Guinness clan?

On the contrary, this family has been in trade for over three hundred years, and before that it was a knightly family given to feudal quarrels and to feudal raids.

We look with pride at Woolworth, who originated the idea of "one-price" goods and cash payments; but that is how Hachirobei Mitsui made his store famous in Tokyo as long ago as 1673. Until then retail business in Japan was done by means of long accounts. Mitsui decided cash and one price was better, and business soon poured into the Mitsui store, still the most famous and largest in Tokyo.

We look with pride to our old banking families; we read with awe the story of the Medici, and how their coat of arms, three gold balls, came later to be adopted as the sign of the money-lender. Not much later than the Medici, the Mitsuis were making their crest famous throughout Japan, for they, too, had become money-lenders, and today are private bankers. That crest—four squares with an eye in each of them set in the shape of a diamond—can today be seen, like a decoration, in the button-hole of thousands of Mitsui employes up and down Japan.

And little men with that powerful sign in the lapels of their coats are in London, New York, Paris, India and, above all, Java and Sumatra. They are now penetrating South America and Africa, and are well known in Berlin.

Incidentally, the Mitsuis had opened a bank in Tokyo, and started an exchange system, ten years before the Bank of England was founded, at the moment that James the Second, was still ruling in London.

We may marvel at the great brewing family of Guinness; but the Mitsuis had made their first fortune out of sake, the popular drink of Japan, when James the First still ruled in England.

The originator of the fortune was fifty-three years old in 1673, when he started his retail store in Tokyo, which was then called Yedo. He was the descendant of a long time of feudal knights, but he felt that since new powers had taken control of Japan, it looked as if commerce and not arms would be most profitable in the years to come, and he ceased to be a noble.

He was right. For two hundred years Japan was governed peacefully by the Shoguns, and the Mitsuis prospered with them. During the years to come they learned the art of advertising. They provided free umbrellas for showers (with their trademark on them.) They subsidized well-known actors to mention their store in gags. They distributed handbills made of wooden blocks as long ago as the days of Good Queen Anne. And the Japanese popular romances (not necessarily three-volume ones) of the early nineteenth century were often filled with references to the firm—well paid for in advance.

When Disraeli was writing of the horrors of sweated labor in "Sybil, or the Tale of Two Nations," and industrialism was at its worst in Britain, it is interesting to note that the Mitsuis were already instituting a profit-sharing scheme for their employes, new bookkeeping rules not unlike our double entry, and making rigid rules for rest periods in the day's work for their employes.

It is, therefore, not unnatural that when Japan entered into the life of the world about 1860, with a new parliamentary system, with an Emperor who had regained his authority and with a people anxious to learn from and then compete with the West, the one big business concern at all approaching Western ideas got an incontestable start in developing its own and its country's inter-

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

No No City

Miami Beach, a most popular resort city, has not post office, no railroad, no cemetery, no street car system, no fresh water, no express office, and no colored residents. Its post office is a sub-station of Miami. The nearest railroad station and the nearest express office are in Miami. Its only street car is an extension from Miami. Its fresh water comes from Hialeah, and the nearest cemetery is beyond Miami. The only colored people allowed to remain there are servants on the premises of their employers.

An Act Of God

About 30 years ago, Willie Pickens White, a negro of Columbia, S. C. contracted a peculiar skin ailment that he was unable to relieve. He didn't bother about it, however, until recently he found himself turning white. First there were small spots of white, and then, 12 hours later, his body changed completely. Physicians examined him but were unable to give an explanation. White was satisfied to say that it was an act of God, to show what he could do.

1,139-Mile Fence

The longest fence in the world stretches across the plains of western Australia, erected for the sole purpose of protection from rabbits. In times of drought the animals migrate by the millions to sections where water and vegetation are plentiful, meeting their doom at the high wire fences topped by barbed wire. At such times, the dead rabbits frequently are piled high against the fence for hundreds of miles. Mounted police—the "Rabbit Patrol"—constantly watch this great fence to keep it rabbit-proof, and to give warning of the approaching armies of the pest.

Social and Personal Notes

LEAVE JAPAN

Mrs. E. G. Plomley and Miss E. B. Plomley left from Tokyo Station at 3 p.m. Sunday on their way to Kobe to catch the N.Y.K. liner Kitano Maru for Australia. Before boarding the boat in Kobe they will visit Nara and Kyoto. Mrs. Plomley and her daughter have been in Tokyo for the past three years.

Destiny Again Rides

Spain.

Along the coasts of war-torn Spain the clash of race against race, section against section, class against class—the eternal clash of the Mediterranean races—resounds to the thunder of the guns. Here the Moors, who centuries ago left the heritage of Africa in conquered Toledo and Granada and in the old Castilian lands, battle once more against the Spaniards, while German and Italian, Frenchman and Russian and representatives of most of the nations of the world, motivated by the lust for power, the pride of principle, the hope of gain, join the bitterest civil war of our era.

But Italy, girded by the Tyrrhenian and the Adriatic Seas, with its appendage of Sicily and the little rock-bound islet of Pantelleria, midway between Sicily and Cape Bon, is now the strategic center of the Mediterranean. Volatile Italians, proud of their modern Roman Empire, preserve the ruined glories of the past, and prepare the glories of the future, beneath the shadow of the Vatican, symbol of a center of Christianity.

Past the vanished splendors of Greece, past the Aegean Isles—a "milky way" of islets—the Mediterranean curves. Its waters lap the shores of what was once the Byzantine Empire, race through the Hellespont, where Byron swam, join the waters of the Black Sea where the minarets and mosques of Istanbul rear toward a soft blue sky.

In the Black Sea the Mediterranean basin impinges upon a harsher land than any its more southern reaches know—Soviet Russia, home of a new political philosophy, land of the agnostic and the unbeliever. In the eastern reaches of the inland sea its waves wash Palestine and Egypt. And through the Suez Canal the Mediterranean is linked to the Red Sea and thence to the Indian Ocean, along whose shores Anglo-Italian rivalry is spreading.

All along the African coast the marts of Europe and the outposts of the desert merge in a shrill medley of race. Muezzins call Mohammedans to prayer; Moors and Libyans, black men and brown and white and half-breeds vie for their places in the sun; a white ribbon of concrete along the Libyan coast marks Italian ambitions; near Bizerta the Tricolor waves above the man-reservoir of France, and further to the west, at Ceuta and around Spanish Morocco guns points north toward the strait, where still the struggle for dominion continues in its never-endi... ...e.

Just as the Mediterranean's mixture of peoples and races, religions and philosophies bears living and perpetual witness to the history of conflict and change, which is its past, its present and its future, so does the traffic it bears attest the diversity of its commerce and the continual struggle for commercial supremacy it inspires.

The Mediterranean trade routes carry practically every product of the world—both those products originating on the shores of the sea and those in transit across its waters from east to west or vice versa. The apes and ivory and peacocks of biblical times, the cedars of Lebanon, the exotic products of far places still form a part of the cargoes battened down beneath the hatches of wallowing freighters or carried below decks on passenger-cargo vessels. But the more important stuff of our modern industrial life forms the bulk of the Mediterranean sea-borne trade, and it is primarily because of this commerce today that the Mediterranean struggle continues now as in the past.

No nation is completely self-sufficient; trade is the bread of international life, and transportation by sea is generally far cheaper than that by land or air. Thus this sea is a line of communication and a highroad of commercial and political empire, and thus the four powers principally concerned with Mediterranean hegemony find their justification for the contemporary struggle for power around the Mediterranean.

England's chief interest in the basin is fairly well suggested by the exaggerated term "lifeline of empire," applied to her trade routes passing through the sea. The Mediterranean route, as the shortest route to the Far East, is of great importance to England (although it is not vital, since for it can be substituted the longer route around Africa). Moreover, Iraq—"a nexus of airlines"—Palestine, Egypt and some smaller territories bordering on the Mediterranean basin are British spheres of influence which must be protected, and their products—Egyptian cotton, the oil of the Mosul and Kirkuk fields, the iron ore of Spain and Spanish Morocco—play a part in Britain's national economy.

Rerouting the British "lifeline" around the Cape would lengthen the British route to Australian ports by some 10 per cent and to India by almost 30 per cent, would require more ships to carry the same amount of traffic and would cause a serious dislocation in British life. But cutting the Mediterranean "lifeline" would not mean strangulation of Britain.

H. Th. de Booy has estimated in an article in Pacific Affairs that each day 50,000 tons of food and 110,000 tons of merchandise are imported into England. To transport these goods there are each day at sea on the principal British trade routes some 815 ships of more than 3,000 tons, all converging on England. Of this number, Mr. de Booy says, only some fifty-seven are daily passing through the Mediterranean between Gibraltar and Suez while those ships carrying products from South Africa and the Mediterranean countries, converging west of Gibraltar, number 139.

But more than trade is involved in saving the Mediterranean "lifeline"; Britain's empire is also concerned, for closure of the Mediterranean to her shipping and to her fleet for any period of time would be a blow not only to her power in the Mediterranean region but to her prestige in the Moslem countries—and thus a blow at the heart of the empire.

Italy—perhaps the chief power in the Mediterranean today—is also motivated by considerations of prestige, as well as by economic reasons. Mussolini has just organized a new empire, has made himself the "protector of Islam" and until recently was making strenuous attempts by radio propaganda, agents and other means to woo the people of Islam around the Mediterranean's rim. His prestige and that of Italy (enormously enhanced by Italy's moral victory over England during the Ethiopian crisis) depend on the bold front, the power he can display.

Italy has said that the conquest of Ethiopia satisfied her land hunger, but this has been questioned in view of the stepping-stones of empire—air and naval bases—that she has sprinkled around the Mediterranean and Red Seas. She has large stakes in both Libya and Ethiopia, and regards both as future war reservoirs. And—most important—the Mediterranean trade routes are vital to Italy; they must be kept open, or Italy dies. Food and raw materials of all description are her imported staff of life, and 86 per cent of them come across the inland-sea routes. It is said that 70 per cent of her supply of petroleum products alone is normally shipped via the Eastern Mediterranean, and her own tanker tonnage is not sufficient to carry her imports.

To France the Mediterranean is an important but not absolutely indispensable connecting link to the man power of her North African colonies, a link which might be broken by Italian naval and air activities from Sardinia and the Balearic Island. She can compensate for severance of those lines of communication by substitution of an all-Atlantic routea to Casablanca, 600miles longer than the direct inland-sea voyage.

France imports over 60 per cent of Iraq's oil (about half her normal requirements), and the Mediterranean means to her, as it does to England, a highroad to the Far East and to Madagascar. She, too, is alarmed by the growing strength of Italian and German influence in the Mediterranean region, and for reasons of prestige, if for no other, is determined to check the further spread of those influences.

German interests in this sea are not as yet sharply defined like those of the other powers, but it is clear from the Reich's participation in the Spanish adventure and her maneuverings in Spanish Morocco that she views the Mediterranean region as a theater for possible expansion, as a lane for her commerce, as presenting perhaps an opportunity to regain and certainly a chance to exploit markets and to develop for herself sources of some much-needed raw materials. And to Russia and Rumania the Mediterranean is a cheap blue-water route to the outside world—not a vital route, but an important one.

Nippon Day by Day

MEMORIAL PERFORMANCE TO HONOR SOLDIER-ACTOR

A memorial performance for the late Kyosuke Tomoda, 38, talented new theater movement actor who died on the Shanghai front a few days ago, is to be held by his friends, with the cooperation of almost all leading actors of the new theater troupes at a theater in Tokyo in November.

4,600 PISTOLS, REVOLVERS DONATED TO STATE

Since the beginning of the movement for the collection of revolvers from private owners a month ago by the Home Ministry, more than 4,600 pistols and revolvers had been contributed to the Ministry by October 8. These pistols and revolvers are to be present to the War and Navy Ministries.

AGED SOLDIER SEEKS SERVICE IN CHINA

War Ministry authorities were much moved by the petition received October 8 from Lieutenant Masabumi Nakayama, 69, a retired officer living at Ushigome, to take part in the war. At the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese Incident he resolved to die on the battlefield in China, and thus petitioned the War Ministry. He participated in the Sino-Japanese War of 1895, the Russo-Japanese War of 1905 and in the Manchurian Incident as an officer in the Manchoukuo Army.

EMPEROR'S LONDON VISIT RECORDED ON CANVAS

A large painting depicting the historical visit of His Majesty the Emperor to London while His Majesty was Crown Prince, by Mr. Hisashi Matsuoka, noted painter, will be exhibited shortly at the Youth Exercise Hall, Azabu, with 77 other paintings of great events in the Japanese history.

OMI SHRINE GROUP HEADED BY PREMIER

To establish the Omi Shrine at a proper site in Shiga Prefecture, the Omi Jingu Hosankai (The Society for Adoration of the Omi Shrine) was organized by leading persons in Shiga Prefecture a few days ago. Premier Konoye became Honorary President of the society recently. Construction of the shrine is expected to be started in the near future.

ANCIENT TEMPLE BATH RECONSTRUCTION PROGRESS

Reconstruction of the memorial great bath in the premises of the Todaiji Temple, Nara, will be completed by the end of this month. The work cost ¥43,706 and required one year. The memorial bath was built by order of Her Majesty the Empress Komyo more than 1,200 years ago for the poor, and was designated a national treasure by the Education Ministry several years ago.

AUTUMN MANEUVERS HELD BY STUDENTS

Large-scale autumn maneuvers were participated in by more than 10,000 students of all middle schools in Tokyo Prefecture at Hachioji and vicinity on October 8 and 9. After severe fighting at dawn of October 9 a great military parade was held at Hachioji in the presence of Governor Yakata of Tokyo Prefecture.

BIG SHIMONOSEKI STATION WILL COST ¥7,000,000

Work on the Shimonoseki Railway Station, to cost ¥7,000,000, will be commenced in a few days by the Hiroshima Bureau of the Railway Ministry. According to the plan issued by the bureau, it is a three-story building, and will be the largest railway station in Western Japan.

Negro Stars Take No-Hit Game, 2-0 At Polo Grounds

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Sept. 20—Johnny Taylor, a 20-year-old fast ball hurler from Hartford Conn., pitched a no-hit, no-run victory for the Negro National League stars against the champion team of the Dominican Republic at the Polo Grounds yesterday. The youthful New England moundsman, backed up by some sensational fielding and the sturdy hitting of Jim West, blanked the Dominican nine by the score of 2 to 0.

West contributed to the victory just as much as did Taylor, for it was the lanky first baseman's home run over the left-field stands in the eighth inning with Kimbro on base that accounted for the league team's runs.

The game was the first of a three-team double-header, held in honor of the Ninety-second and Ninety-third Divisions reunion at the American Legion convention.

In the second game the Negro league aggregation registered another shut-out victory, conquering a team of minor league players, 1 to 0, in seven innings. A crowd of 15,000 fans witnessed the games.

Opposing Taylor was Satchell Paige, generally regarded as the greatest of Negro pitchers. Paige did well in his own right, striking out eight batters and yielding only one base on balls, as against Taylor's five strikeouts and two passes. Paige yielded eight hits, but kept them well scattered until the eighth when Kimbro's pinch single preceded West's homer.

The scores by innings:

be used in building, and of edible fats, which, when fortified with synthetic vitamins, could be used to maintain a national supply of vital foods.

The present source of toluene is coal; and to this picture of a growing industry for making many products out of oil now made from coal Dean Frank C. Whitmore of Pennsylvania State College, the president-elect of the society, added, in a short speech with which he opened a symposium on the chemical utilization of petroleum hydrocarbons, the observation that:

"Petroleum is a vast reservoir of chemicals, from which hundreds of new industries, surpassing in number and magnitude those derived from coal tar, will arise."

Reviewing the history of now European chemists found coal the source for many substances that have become vital and of how petroleum was meanwhile neglected. Dr. Whitmore added:

"It has now dawned on us that the reason for the dozens of industries based on coal tar is our knowledge of hundreds of chemicals existing in coal tar and of nearly countless thousands of others which can be made from them.

"How different is the situation in petroleum. There we know of two or three dozens of the chemical contained in it and these amount to only about 10 per cent of the crude oil."

To these known chemicals, research by Dr. J. R. Bailey of the University of Texas has added a number. Dr. Bailey revealed that one was lepidine, a dye source from which is obtained the sensitizer used in infra-red photography and now derived from coal.

Thus, from the same substance, Dr. Egloff's co-workers have developed a way of making such a smoke pall as the world has never seen, and Dr. Bailey has found a dye that will permit photographers to take pictures through it.

Guffa Boats Of The Tigris

One of the most interesting and intriguing things I have seen on my many visits to Baghdad are the flat-bottomed guffa boats which have plied up and down the Tigris River for thousands of years, transporting both cargo and passengers. Unlike any other boats in the world, they are perfectly round, thus having neither stem nor stern.

The shallow waters of the Tigris necessitated boats of this type thousands of years ago, and they have lasted through the ages, because boat builders could not improve upon their style and construction. Being made of reeds tightly woven together, covered by a thin surface of pitch, the boats are very light in weight and are capable of being loaded full without drawing more than six or eight inches of water.

Wages Lagging

January 1, and had fallen behind another 4,000,000 rubles by July 1. In Stalingrad region, the wage arrears amounted to 6,000,000 rubles on July 1, and the Donetz region was even further behind. In the latter, Izvestia reported that a record-breaking brigade, nationally praised for its achievements, had received no wages for four months. No figures were given for regions where last year's yield was meager.

Non-payment of wages was probably a factor in labor demoralization reported earlier this year. In many districts, spring sowing was delayed for a month or more because agricultural machinery had not been put in order. However, Izvestia expressed admiration for "the spirit of tractor and combineharvester drivers who continued to work efficiently despite the criminal negligence of officials."

Get Coal-Gasoline On Quantity Basis

By CRAIG THOMPSON

N. Y. Times

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 7—A process for taking gasoline from coal on a quantity basis was placed before the American Chemical Society here today by the United States Bureau of Mines and opened possibilities of a future race for markets between two of the nation's giant industries.

Following, as it did, announcements yesterday of new processes and discoveries by which substances derived from coal in the past could now be made from petroleum, it foreshadowed a day when the buying public of the nation might be called upon to decide whether it wanted many of the necessities of civilization brought out of the ground in solid or liquid form, with one group of industries controlling the liquids and another the solids.

Chemists now look to both sources for a variety of practically identical substances vital to the present mode of life, explosives for war, fuels for transportation and warmth at office and home, dyes, medicines, paints, lacquers and a long list of other things.

The contribution by the Federal chemists, in a day of sessions that featured also an effort in another direction to bridge the gap between the laboratory and the man in the street, for whom life goes on changing through forces he does not understand, had a further implication. The coal used in the experiments came from Pennsylvania, where an abundance of coal in abandoned mines has become a social and political problem.

Medicinal Patents Surveyed

The featured effort to bridge the gap was a symposium entitled, "Are Patents on Medicinal Discoveries and on Foods in the Public Interest?" In it Dr. Morris Fishbein, official of the American Medical Association and editor of its Journal, proposed that a national board be set up to control the patents that university and research laboratories might obtain on new products and processes for man's health.

Dr. Fishbein's contention was that, as things are now, there is a vast amount of confusion and argument, as well as legal difficulties, and that it all "seemed to point toward the necessity of some unbiased body to assume responsibility and control in this field."

He suggested that, since physicians had shown themselves to be unselfishly devoted to the welfare of mankind, the board to administer this patent control should be a "holding corporation responsible to the board of trustees of the American Medical Association. The association is a corporation, not for profit, with an obligation primarily to the public."

His argument bristled with thrusts at conditions of the past and present. He recalled that insulin was developed by a physician, biochemists and physiologists, and that Sir Frederick Banting, the physician, "received one dollar for the sale of the patent to the University of Toronto and derives not one cent of royalty from his discovery, whereas some of his associates, who were not physicians, have had the advantage of such royalties."

Dr. Fishbein asserted that the changing order, with greater specialization in medicine, growth of great industries, laboratory discoveries, indicated a revision of "the medical point of view concerning medical patents."

The holding of such patents by universities, he said, had "to some degree" assured standardization of patent products under their control and had kept honest the commercial exploitation and sale of the products.

Sees Return Owed to Public

However, he went on, "one of the most cogent arguments now advanced concerns the relationship of the university or research institute to taxation."

"Endowed universities and research institutions, as well as scientific organizations and trust funds in the interests of the public," Dr. Fishbein remarked, "are usually exempt from taxation. They owe a definite duty to the public which bears the burden of taxation.

"Universities must consider the extent to which exploitation of patents for the benefit of the institution may not bring upon them the new burden of taxation from which they are now exempt.

"Patents which have aroused the most debate and trouble at present are the scarlet fever patents held by the Scarlet Fever Foundation, the copper-iron patent held by the University of Wisconsin and perhaps the various patents concerned with the production of vitamin D and vitamin D products.

"The sun in the sky should be freely available to all who wish to see it. Yet it has been hinted that there are some concerned with patents on vitamin D who would even inhibit investigators from experimenting with the sun."

Rays of the sun produce the health-giving vitamin D in the human body.

Another speaker in the symposium was Dean Walter C. Russell of the New Jersey Agricultural Experiment Station at New Brunswick, a director of the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation which controls a basic patent on vitamin D. He said that the research foundation had been found a competent organization.

Incentive of Gain Cited

Another was George B. Schley of Indianapolis, a patent attorney. His major point was that a worker with a personal gain in sight would do better work, or in other words, create better patents.

A canvass of chemists attending the sessions, particularly among scientists who have had some success in developing new products, produced a variety of reactions. Some did not wish to have the patents of chemists in medicinal or food fields controlled by the American Medical Association.

Some did not believe that it would benefit the public to reduce competition among chemists as they believed a pooling of patents would do; and some felt that, in a field that has become so enormous because of its various complexities that no single man could comprehend the whole of it, any kind of control would be a hindrance. A few felt that Dr. Fishbein's proposal was a sound one.

They were informed in an evening address by Dr. E. R. Weidlein, director of the Mellon Institute of Industrial Research and president of the Chemical Society that "chemistry is constantly seeking through research natural facts on which to base new truths which bring about changes."

"But she cannot invoke them alone, without the aid of her sister sciences, any one of which may at any moment find a new bit of knowledge which will lead the others along new trails. This world-wide collaboration is really the hope of scientific progress today.

"Modern research is characterized by its complexity and the variety of phases it presents. In the latter half of the last century and the beginning of the present, it was still possible for an individual, working alone and with comparatively limited facilities, to achieve epoch-making results in the border-line fields of research. The surface has now been well explored and it is consequently necessary to probe deeper and to enlist the cooperation of trained specialists in such widely diversified fields as chemistry, biology, physics and engineering."

Brooklyn Paper on Lead Poison

Among the variety of papers presented during the day was one which, in its implication, stemmed cooperation, patented work and medicinal research, to the coal from the ground.

Prepared by Drs. Albert E. Sobel, Oscar Gawron and Benjamin Kramer of the Jewish Hospital of Brooklyn, it dealt with the influence of Vitamin D in lead poisoning.

Lead poisoning, which has become a prevalent disease for which competent curative measures are being anxiously sought, is caused to a large degree by the lead fumes, paints and other substances that are a mark of present civilization. Lead fumes are in the air of our streets, coming from the exhaust of automobiles in the gaseous remains of a compound derived from coal and used as no-knock gasoline.

The Brooklyn workers found, in experiments on rats, that vitamin D, necessary to make the bones of children grow straight and to keep them from having defective teeth, aggravated the deadly effects of lead poisoning. Vitamin D comes from the ultraviolet rays of the sun, and from other sources, but the effect of their paper was that sunshine increased the activity of the poison.

The question whether lead tetraethyl, the source of the fume poisoning, would continue to be present in the gasoline from coal in the same quantities now used in highest petroleum gas, was one which Dr. H. Storch, the Bureau of Mines chemist who led the research on gasoline from coal, had not answered.

The Coal-Gasoline Process

Working with Dr. Storch were L. L. Hirst, P. L. Golden, I. I. Pinkel, R. L. Boyer, J. L. Schaeffer and R. H. Kallenberger, all of the bureau. Mr. Storch was unable to attend, due to illness, and his paper on the chemistry of coal hydrogenation, containing the underlying principles of the work, was read by a colleague.

The entire report comprised three papers. In the first it was shown that a process for hydrogenation of coal had been worked out, whereby, at high temperatures, the hard substance was reduced to a liquid through hydrogenation.

The result was that the coal broke down into liquids equal to about 84 per cent of the original volume, 50 per cent of them a light oil and the remainder a heavy one. Actually 88 per cent liquids were produced, the rest of the original matter having become gas or remained as solids in the process.

As indicating the possibilities, their paper showed that 34 per cent of a ton of coal could be remade into oils, although no estimate was given on the costs of this process, as compared to the cost of producing a similar volume of petroleum oil of the same quality.

From the coal oils can be made most of the products derived from petroleum, and in the oils, gases and solids are all the necessary matter for the production of any derivative product of coal now being made.

The gasoline is produced by cracking the oil, the same process now used in getting gasoline from petroleum. In quality it is declared to be higher than petroleum gasoline, having a higher anti-knock rating, and thereby offering greater efficiency in a high compression motor.

Model Plant Set Up

As a part of their experimental work the chemists of the Bureau of Mines have set up a continuous-process hydrogenation plant of 100 pounds capacity. The plant is a miniature of the kind of plant that would be required for commercial production.

The research was undertaken, in part, as a measure of conservation of the national resources, on the proposition that the oil supplies would be exhausted nationally far sooner than would those of coal, and in part on the theory that, since the structure of coal and petroleum were somewhat similar, both might be made to produce a variety of similar products.

In the commercial field it had one other important aspect. Until now, all of the many things man uses every day that are derived from coal come as a result of making coal into coke. The demand for coke regulated the supply for the derivatives, commercially.

This was the fact that sent petroleum chemists into research for producing coal products from oil.

In the new process, there is involved no vast waste as would result if coal were distilled into coke for the by-products alone. All of the coal, as it comes from the ground, goes into the hydrogenation plant. All of it comes out again, as oil, gas or a small residue of solids.

General Ho Reported Sent To South China On Important Mission

By The Domei Tsushin Sha

HONGKONG, Oct. 10—Keen interest was aroused here today by reports that General Ho Ying-chin, former Minister of War of the National Government, arrived at Canton from Nanking yesterday on an important mission in connection with the campaign in South China.

It was reported that in view of the gravity of the situation facing South China, the former Nanking War Minister was sent to the South to establish a powerful military organ. General Ho was even reported to have been appointed general commander of military operations in South China. He will supervise the South China District, including Kwangtung, Kwangsi and Fukien.

Upon his arrival in the provincial capital yesterday afternoon, General Ho summoned all important local military and political officials to a conference to discuss urgent policies to be pursued in dealing with the local situation.

Those present at the conference reportedly included General Wu Teh-cheng, Chairman of the Kwangtung Provincial Government, Mr. Tseng Yang-pu, Mayor of Canton, and Mr. Hsing Han-ping.

War In Europe

much more likely.

"Russia's energies are now devoted to preventing an Eastern European alliance which would exclude the Soviets, as Mussolini's are devoted to the promotion of a four-power alliance which would be exactly that.

"Any one who predicts what will happen in Europe is a fool. The dictators themselves do not know. They are only men, pitched around by events, now sure what their next moves will be.

Three Fundamental Conflicts

"There are tremendous conflicts at work—national conflicts, ideological ones, and, finally, the conflict of the ages.

"Some countries are in the seventeenth century, some in the eighteenth. Only a few have reached the twentieth. These conflicts came to a head with the end of the Versailles treaty period and the rise to power of Hitler.

"The danger of the dictator governments is that they have done for their countries those things which parliamentary governments should have done, but they were short-sighted when they had power.

"In the United States, with its technical and scientific development and its comparative absence of foreign pressure, an effort should be made to determine how much democracy is consistent with our economic and social development.

"In this mass-production world we will probably have to sacrifice some of it. Our best minds should be put to work on it, since there is undoubtedly a conflict now between the world's economic and its political development. It comes not from politicians, but from forces."

Generous

Brown had been searching vainly for tools in his shed, and went to his wife.

"What?" he said, on learning where they had gone. "D'you mean to say you've lent the fork and spade to the woman next door? What am I going to do?"

"Oh, I forgot to tell you, dear," his wife replied. "I promised to lend you, too, to dig over her kitchen garden!"—Tit-Bits.

Tom Howard's Pipes

Tom Howard has collected 631 different smoking pipes over a period of four years, and now has them on display in his home at Red Bank, N. J. These pipes, coming from many foreign countries, have either been collected personally in frequent trips to odd shops or been sent to him by his many fans all over the world who have learned of his hobby. They range in value from a 10-cent corncob to a $100 meerschaum, and range in size from ¾ of an inch long to a huge relic of the St. Louis Exposition, 7 feet in length with a 2-foot tobacco bowl.

Re-entry Of Black laugh he was entitled to one too, for he added, 'Bless you my children.' He got a laugh. But Graves came back with 'We don't kiss, do we?'

Commended by Grand Klaliff

"Through the laughter Klansmen Black and Graves stood with hands still clasped. * * * And now Grand Klaliff Ellis turns to the keynote of the Klorero.

"'I have been asked by our Grand Dragon to perform a task which to me is a most welcome one,' Klansman Ellis tells the two before him.

"'I want to ask you to think of yourselves for just a moment the way your fellow Klansmen in the Realm of Alabama think of you and the way the loyal citizens of America, the nation over, are thinking of you, as the men who have been chosen by the Klansmen of Alabama to come out into the forefront.

"'I want you to think of yourselves as having been put out by them before the world for all the world to gaze upon as exponents of Klancraft, exponents of those principles of pure Americanism which the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan stand for.

"'And as you think of yourselves in that way, I would have you realize that, since we, your fellow Klansmen, have put you in such a position, we accept fully the responsibility that comes upon our shoulders, and we stand four-square behind you, holding you up before our American citizenship as our ideals.

Presenting of Gold Plaques

"'The Grand Dragon has asked me to represent him as he makes to you a presentation of certain certificates which will bear before the Klansmen throughout the nation some semblance of the respect, the regard, the devotion and the support which he, as your personal friend and as your Grand Dragon, and through him your fellow Klansmen, hold for you.'

"Then—'Which comes first, a United States Senator or a Governor?' Klaliff Ellis wants to know. And Klansman Black modestly replies: 'The Governor.' So Klaliff Ellis turns to Klansman Graves and hands him a gleaming gold plaque.

"'I can't read it,' he tells him. Maybe you can. It is a Grand Passport.'

"'And,' he goes on, turning Hugo Black, a Grand Passport which will admit you to the society of your fellow Klansmen wherever they are to be found.

"'These, as you will notice, and as the Grand Dragon called to my attention when he asked me to present them to you, bear no date of limitation. In other words, we as your fellow Klansmen and he as your Grand Dragon would have you both realize that they are good as long as you are good and that your fellow Klansmen of the Realm of Alabama will put the date of retirement upon those certificates for you when you yourselves make such action necessary and not until then.'

"Now Grand Dragon Esdales calls on Klansman Graves to respond.

"'This imperial passport, on gold, that is to last as long as I am true to the principles of Klancraft, will go with me as mine to my final resting place,' Graves begins, as the assembled Klansmen applaud.

"'If I can but be, as Dr. Ellis has said, if I can but be as you believe me to be, if I can measure up to that high standard that you have given to me and measure me by then and then only will I be worth to keep this with all that it signifies, so long as life shall last.

"'And, Klansmen, with all the fervor of a heart that has never learned the alphabet of forgetfulness I pledge you and those that you represent that, with the help of God, with His guidance, I shall in all the walks of life as best I can be a living exemplar of a white man's Protestant Christian Americanism.

Renewal of Altar Oath

"'The things that I swore about that altar (pointing to the Klan altar) I want you to help me keep. I beg you to pray for me. There is going to be many a shaft fired through me at you.

"'So far as I know, no Cyclops has ever been placed in the position that I am to occupy.

"'You know that every real enemy of Klancraft throughout the State and this country would really delight in seeing a Cyclops-Governor the greatest failure in American history. The Klan is on trial; it is not Bibb Graves but it is the Ku Klux Klan that stands on trial, not only in Alabama but throughout America. * * *' And Bibb Graves closes with a pledge to make as Governor a better Alabama not only for Klansmen but for every citizen of the State."

Italians Are Hard

accepted by white men.

The men I watched and talked to were of exceptionaly good physique, recruited from all parts of Italy, working together with energy, endurance and pride in their really amazing achievements. In spite of the strain of having to be constantly on the alert, ready to drop pick-axe and shovel and take up the guns stacked for instant use against Ethiopian attackers, they appeared in good spirits and ever ready to lend me a hand over a bad stretch of road. The natives living along the highway came to gaze in wonder at the road-builders—objects of derision, men who worked. No free, self-respecting Ethiopian male ever exerted himself except to hunt, go to war or supervise the agricultural activities of his womenfolk or his slaves.

At Makale, the next town on the highway, there was much evidence of the damage done in the desperate fighting of early November, 1936, when the Italians met the first real resistance. Large sections of the town had been wiped out by aerial bombs, and in quarters still occupied by natives many a roof had been blown away and every wall bore shell holes. On the other side of the brook the ghebi of Ras Gugsa was undergoing extensive renovation to serve as headquarters for Italian officials.

The most noticeable effects of civilization in Makale were to be seen in the amusement quarter. The section consists of more than 200 native huts and contains hundreds of native women, and it is patrolled by Italian military police. Visits by soldiers are forbidden. But the dusky entertainers obviously have come upon prosperous days. Their native robes have given way to Japanese silk pajamas, and their frizzled ebony locks now glisten with European brilliantine instead of rancid butter. So far the real victors of the East African campaign appear to have been these swarthy belles and the Italian truck drivers whose monthly earnings average 5,000 lire—the pay of a colonel in the Italian Army.

In the mountains beyond Makale it was such rough going that I could make not more than ten miles an hour, but I felt rewarded when the last hairpin curve brought me to the top of Amba Alaji. From this pinnacle, captured by the Italians with heavy loss of life, I could look out over hundreds of miles of hills and valleys of a fruitful land as yet practically unexplored by white men.

The road to the military station in the Quoram Valley had just been completed, but in a valley at the edge of the Danakil Desert, the "Hellhole of Abyssiania," there was a new variety of bad road. A piece of highway partly finished the previous Spring had been flooded in the recent rainy season and after the whole surface had been washed away it was left as an almost impassable jumble of boulders. Laborers were working night and day to lay as much asphalt as possible before the next heavy rains.

British Ease Army Life More

LONDON, Sept. 18.—The latest inducement in army recruiting in Great Britain is a ruling that soldiers more than twenty-one years old may sleep away from their barracks if serving at home stations. To the oldtime soldier it is all "pretty soft and fancy," of this new ruling comes in addition to four meals a day and a number of other considerations which are being made build up the strength of the army.

Nippon Day by Day

NATIONAL SPIRIT GROUP FORMALLY ORGANIZED

Inauguration of the Central Federation for National Spiritual Mobilization was observed at the Hibiya Public Hall on the afternoon of October 12 preceding National Spirit Mobilization Week, which starts today throughout the country. Premier Konoye, Count Raiju Matsudaira, President of the House of Peers, Speaker Shoju Koyama of the House of Representatives, Admiral Ryokitsu Arima and Count Tadamasa Sakai attended.

POLICE TO CONTROL SALES OF SWORDS

To control imitations of famous Japanese swords which have appeared in great numbers since the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese Incident, the Metropolitan Police Board ordered police stations in Tokyo Prefecture to control strictly dealings in this kind of sword at unlawful prices a few days ago. With the issuance of the new control plan by the Metropolitan Police, the contribution of Japanese swords, by Tokyoites was requested by the police.

MUNICIPAL EMPLOYES BACK SPIRIT DRIVE

No less than 3,000 officials and employes of the Tokyo Municipal Office rallied at the Hibiya Public Hall on the morning of October 12 to pray for the success of Japanese soldiers at the China fronts and to take an oath to back the National Spirit Mobilization Movement, which starts today.

CRANE VISITS PALACE; SEEN AS GOOD OMEN

At noon October 11, when the weather cleared, a white crane visited the Imperial Moat in front of the Metropolitan Police Board Office, and after several minutes flew away, circling over the Imperial Castle. The crane is regarded as a good omen among the Japanese.

FUKUSHIMA BRIDE, GROOM ARE 62 AND 89

Tadayoshi Tanaka, 89, resident of Koriyama, Fukushima Prefecture, and Miss Haru Hoshi, 62, were married at the bridegroom's residence in that city several days ago. The couple were too shy to talk to reporters.

FAIR MAIDS OF SAKATA CAN HOLD THEIR OWN

Among the more than 200 women workers who specialize in carrying straw rice-bags at Sakata, Yamagata Prefecture, Misses Harumi Honma, 25, and Kiyoe Kondo, 23, were reported to be able to carry 55 straw rice-bags in a single load, no less than 89 kan in weight, or 334 kilograms.

SOLDIERS' FAMILIES GET PRICE DISCOUNT

To perfect the relief work for families of soldiers in China the Shibuya Ward Office has issued "family tickets" for these families, with the cooperation of 59 merchant guilds in the ward. Prices of daily necessities and food are to be discounted for the owners of tickets when they buy in the ward.

British Revive Fight On New Divorce Laws

N. Y. Herald Tribune

LONDON, Sept. 18—A new burst of controversy over Great Britain's divorce laws finds church leaders attacking the new law broadening the grounds for divorce, while other groups map a drive for still further liberalization.

Demands that habitual drunkenness and life imprisonment be accepted as grounds for divorce are being heard. Not satisfied with the recent, revolutionary changes in British divorce laws, including admission of cruelty, desertion and insanity as ground for divorce, the Divorce Law Reform Union wants "additional facilities for reasonable and equitable divorce."

Leaders of the Church of England, refusing to accept the principles of the new divorce laws, are expected to challenge with still more vigor any campaign for further changes. Preparations are being made for handling the extraordinary rush of applicants for divorce which is expected when the new matrimonial causes act goes into effect next January.

Rejected 22,000 Petitions

Last year the courts rejected 22,000 formal petitions for divorce on grounds which, after January 1, will be acceptable. "The Liverpool Diocesan Review," edited by the Bishop of Liverpool, as a guide to the increase in divorces expected, says that "there are in this country not fewer than 150,000 men and women who are married but legally separated . . . divorced in all but name."

Out of this situation is awaited a calendar of divorce petitions that will make it necessary to provide additional court facilities. So far church leaders have flatly refused to accept as church practice any of the divorce reforms approved by the state. Fundamental church law on the question of marriage and divorce remains the same. Individual clergy are expected to interpret the new divorce laws differently, but on the whole it is expected that persons divorced under the new rules will not enjoy remarriage by the church nor admission to communion.

More than ever before, it is pointed out, individuals seeking divorce will have their choice between adherence to church laws or acceptance of the laws of the state as regards marriage or divorce.

Attacks on the new divorce laws continue. The Bishop of Ely, writing in his "Diocesan Gazette," believes the divorce act to be directly contrary to Christ's teachings. "It is beyond question that our Lord's explicit precepts are disregarded in this new act," he says.

Some support for the bill, on the other hand, is found through "The Liverpool Diocesan Review." Referring to "a wide social injustice which the act will tend to remedy," "The Review" says:

"There are in this country not fewer than 150,000 men and women who are married, but legally separated. They are divorced in all but name. Many of them form irregular unions and have families often as happy and united as those of legal marriages. But the children are heavily handicapped. They often are unaware until one parent dies that in the eyes of the law they are illegitimate. There are not less than 20,000 of them."

Definies Cruelty Provisions

A. P. Herbert, Member of Parliament, author of the new divorce act, returned to the controversy in a broadcast analysis of the provisions of the new bill. He argued that cruelty as a ground for divorce under the new act did not mean "Hollywood or Reno cruelty."

"Legal cruelty has been strictly defined by the English courts for a very long time as 'conduct of such a character as to have caused danger to life, limb or health (bodily or mental), so as to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger.'" he said.

"But danger to mental health does not rightly or wrongly include what the Americans know as mental cruelty. That is to say, no one will be able to get a divorce because a husband spends too much time fishing, or a wife become a film star, and so on."

New Italy Rises Out Of Disorder, Says US Observer

By HERBERT U. NELSON
Secretary National Association of US Real Estate Boards

The new Italy is rising swiftly from the ruins and disorder of the old. Driving through Rapallo, Florence and Venice, as Robert B. Whitaker, of Kenosha Wisconsin, and I did recently, we were conscious of this the moment we entered the country. In France, which we had just left, building is at a standstill except for a few projects carried on by the government. But when we left the French Riviera and crossed into northern Italy, we began at once to see hundreds of fine new homes going up, scores of fine apartment buildings being rushed to completion. And all of the work was being done with refreshing dash, good humor and spirit.

It is difficult to get good figures on the national volume of building. They are not published in readily accessible form, and officials seem cautious about giving out information. In Florence, a city of 300,000, more than 3,000 new family units were built last year and new construction is still going ahead. For the country as a whole, it is probable that about 140,000 new units were erected in 1936.

New Houses Have Red Tile Roofs

The new homes are built of brick, tile and stucco, in simple rectangular lines, with red tile roofs. The severe plainness of the walls often is relieved by painted frescos, usually done with stencils. This is cheap, but it gives pleasant color and variety. The apartment houses usually are four and five stories, built of reinforced concrete, and often with attractive little balconies for each apartment. The rooms are being built smaller than the former Italian custom. Central heating is installed in the newest construction. Three, four and five rooms are the most usual units. The floors are tiled and show many attractive patterns. In our climate such floors would no doubt seem cold, but here they appear quite suitable and do away with the need for expensive floor coverings.

In cities such as Genoa and Florence it is impressive to set entire blocks of ramshackle and unhealthy old apartments being torn down and replaced by fine new structures. Demolition is carried on by the government, which clears out the slums and arranges for compensation to the owners. New building is carried on almost entirely by private enterprise, which takes over the cleared land by purchase or lease and does the building. Loans are available for building at 4 per cent, running for terms as long as sixty years. Italy gives a twenty-five-year tax exemption on all new construction.

Factories Being Rebuilt

Many of Italy's factories are being rebuilt in the modern fashion with good light and air. In Genoa a huge rocky hill about 400 feet high and 1,000 feet long in the center of the city is being leveled and a new business section built. The project reminds me very much of a similar one carried out at Seattle a few years ago. Roads everywhere are being widened, straightened and improved, and often beautifully planted with trees and flowers. One fine highway of forty miles between Pisa and Florence does not have a single cross railroad, all crossings being by passes, and no pedestrians are allowed on it. This stretch is a motorist's paradise. New public buildings of all kinds are rising. We saw at least a half dozen new medical centers or clinics finely housed. Nowhere did we see any fiddling with useless make-work projects.

The big massive Italian type of furniture for homes is giving way to the simpler and lighter types common with us as the rooms in the homes and apartments grow smaller. This trend is credited to the Americans. The Americans in turn credit the modern styles to Europeans. So everybody should be happy. An American vice-consul told me that he lives in an eighteen-room apartment, with ceilings fifteen feet high, for which he is paying a rent of $500 a year. He is moving soon into an eight-room apartment, "American style," with small rooms and requiring only one servant, where the rent also is to be $500 a year. A good house servant receives about $7 a month, and this rate, which seems very low to us but high to Italians, is a factor in the trend toward smaller units.

Central Heating "Pretty Sketchy"

Construction in the new Italian housing is strong and attractive but lacks the refinements upon which Americans insist. While central heating is coming in, it is pretty sketchy in its arrangements. Insulation for walls and floors is not used except in the most luxurious homes. Exterior wall of brick or concrete tile get the plaster applied directly on the inside and outside without lathing. Interior planning seemed to me not so convient as ours. Gadgets are scarce.

Of great interest are the societies in Italian cities organized for the purpose of providing housing for the poor. Most of these date back forty years or so, when the movement started. Assistance for housing is thus a recognized form of philanthropy for all wealthy persons, just as hospitals and education are with us. The head of the master builders' group in Florence stated these societies have done much good and have made government assistance less necessary than would otherwise have been the case. In some cases the municipality donates land to such societies. Thus, with free land, exemption from taxes and remission of interest, good housing is supplied at rents of $4 and $5 a month for those in the lowest income group. The local societies consist of the most distinguished persons in the community, and this is good guaranty that funds are well expended and work is well done.

It would appear that the movement for better housing in our country needs just this type of local interest and support, which it now largely lacks, if good progress is to be made.

Music Hath Charms

Domenico Cimarosa was born in Aversa, Naples, in 1749, the son of a mason and a laundress. Between 1774 and 1787, he wrote no less than 49 grand operas, each of which was a brilliant success. He was honored by two great foreign sovereigns, Catherine II of Russia and Joseph of Austria. He returned to his native Naples in 1793 and resumed his successful operatic work. His activities finally displeased King Ferdinand of Naples, at whose order the maestro was seized and sentenced to death. Powerful interests interceded for the composer, and the King consented to commute the sentence to lifelong exile. Cimarosa died in exile in Venice, which was an Austrian possession at the time, in 1801. The populace has long suspected that he was poisoned by the orders of the Neapolitan government. The King repeated ly uttered his apprehension that Cimarosa's facile and prolific talent for entertainment would cause the Neapolitans to lose their military ability and manly virtues.

Accepted At Current Rates

Looking back across the long downward slant of his work, it is hard to imagine the blaze of glory that wrapped Kipling in the '90's. He dazzled critics and children alike. Every one quoted him. Each story, each verse he published rang the bell, and millions caught up and cherished the echo of every bold stroke. Wherefore he was stalked and harried, by editors and reporters, by enthusiasts and the curious and the autograph seeker. He showed Carey one letter he had received. The writer had enclosed a quarter, a blank page, and a stamped, addressed envelope. He had heard that Kipling now got twenty-five cents a word. Would he please, for the enclosed coin, forward just one word? Kip did. He wrote "Thanks" and mailed it back.—Harper's Magazine.

SOULS OF POLICEMEN REMEMBERED IN CEREMONY

The annual ceremony for consoling the souls of 440 policemen who have died at their posts was observed at the Yayoi Shrine, Kojimachi, on the morning of October 13 in the presence of about 1,000 persons, including Jyu Saito, Superintendent of the Metropolitan police, Lieutenant-General Kotaro Nakamura and the Commander of the Eastern District Defense Headquarters.

WAR MINISTER RECEIVES GIFT OF CANDY

War Minister Gen Sugiyama was much moved by the sincerity of three Hokkaido-born boys named Ryosa Ueda, Ryuhei Ueda and Yukio Yoshida, who sent a can of candy with a consoling letter to the War Office on October 13. The boys started to sell candy to raise a donation for the national defense fund at the outbreak of the China incident. In sending the present to General Sugiyama they said they had been moved by the strenuous efforts of the War Minister about which they read in the newspapers.

SHOCHIKU ACTOR SIGNS WITH TOHO

Chojiro Hayashi, one of the outstanding actors of the Shochiku Kyodo Film Studio, joined the Toho Movie Company on the evening of October 13 when the announcement was made of the official contract between Hayashi and the Toho Company at the residence of Mr. Osawa, director of the Toho Movie Company in Kyoto. The unexpected report of Hayashi's withdrawal is said to have shocked the authorities of the Shochiku Company.

The poster was designed by Taikan Yokoyama, outstanding painter of the Japanese school, and bears the Japanese national anthem, written by the Premier. The poster is to be sent to Government offices, firms and banks throughout the country.

Envoy Credited With Union Of Reich And Italy

By SONIA TOMARA

N. Y. Herald Tribune

ROME, Sept. 25.—Ulrich von Hassel, German Ambassador at Rome, is credited here with bringing about the rapprochement between Germany and Italy which resulted in Premier Benito Mussolini's visit to Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler this week end.

One of Europe's ablest diplomats, Hassel has passed much time in Italy and is thoroughly familiar with Italy's literature, art and culture. He has won Mussolini's confidence.

After Hitler's unsuccessful visit to Italy in 1934, Hassel patiently sought an opportunity to inaugurate an era of good feeling between the two countries. This came when the League of Nations imposed sanctions on Italy and Germany stood by her.

It was the beginning of the development of trade between the two countries. While Italian troops advanced into Ethiopia, Hassel worked at his idea that Italy and Germany should stand together to defend Europe's culture against communism. The nucleus of the Rome-Berlin axis idea was formed in his mind and during the winter of 1936 he made frequent journeys from Rome to Berlin as an intermediary between the two dictators.

Efforts Are Successful

His efforts were successful in June of that year, when on Italy's advice Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg of Austria signed a peace compact with Germany. Hitler signified that he had given up his scheme of conquering Austria, and Mussolini recognized without saying so that friendship with Germany was more important for him than Austria's independence. Since then the Spanish civil war, which the two dictators pictured as an attempt of Soviet Russia to implant communism in Western Europe, cemented Italo-German sympathy into the Rome-Berlin axis and a virtual alliance.

Mussolini's son-in-law, Count Galeazzo Ciano, whom he had appointed as his Minister for Foreign Affairs, enthusiastically supported this alliance. The Germans were intelligent enough to give Ciano's wife, Edda Mussolini, in the summer of 1936, and himself in October of that year, a warm welcome, which caused them to favor Germany. Besides that, the failure of the League to recognize the Ethiopian conquest prompted Italy's friendship with Germany.

In December Hassel brought forward the idea of an official visit by Mussolini to Berlin. This idea was to mature slowly and the trip to be carefully prepared. During the winter and spring Il Duce had to visit Libya and to have meetings with the central European premiers. He had also to occupy himself with the Spanish conflict and to think of Italy's economic recovery after the Ethiopian war and sanctions.

Nations on Parallel Lines

Finally the date for the trip was set to coincide with the German military maneuvers after the end of the Nuremberg Nazi gathering. Europe's general atmosphere has changed so much since June, 1934, when the two leaders met for the first time, that the whole aspect of this second interview is bound to be quite different.

Germany and Italy at present are moving along parallel lines, the Italians like to point out. Their interests are called the same with regard to Russia and Spain, and to a certain extent in the Far East. Both countries are anxious to arrive at an agreement with Great Britain and to try to form a triangular accord which they hope will finally oblige France to give up her pact with the Soviets. Austria, for the moment, is left aside. Germany is convinced that this little state will sooner or later join her. Italy believes it impossible to defend Austria's independence by arms if the Austrian people eventually turn Nazi.

Russia Scraps Census, Calling It 'Defective'

MOSCOW, Sept. 26.—Charging that the national population census taken last January 6 was defective, the Sovnarkom (Council of People's Commissars) early this morning threw away the results of enormous statistical labir and ordered a new tabulation.

The order marks a probable all-time high point in self-criticism, even for the present phase of the Soviet Union's vigilant skepticism about all the works of those leaders who have recently been disgraced.

The brief statement issued by the Sovnarkom did not pin responsibility on any individual, but it is significant that the count was carried out under the supervision of the Central Statistical Bureau, whose chief, Ivan A. Kraval, recently was denounced as an enemy of the people, reports the New York Herald Tribune. The reformed bureau now has been ordered to carry out a new census on January 19, 1939.
